[1] Market value in Boston.

Mr. Chairman, I am not satisfied with the argument that a high tariff will foster the sheep industry and that a low tariff or no tariff at all will destroy it. Wool was on the free list under the Wilson law, but we must remember that the greatest panic which ever visited this country was on before this bill was passed, the effects of which lasted until after its repeal. Let us compare sheep raising during two great panics—the one of the early seventies, under high protection, and the other in the nineties, under free wool—and see how the sheep fared in Ohio. At the beginning of the panic of 1870 Ohio had 6,250,000 sheep and in 1872 she had 4,548,100 sheep. In two years, under the pressure of that panic, with a high-protective duty on wool, Ohio lost over 1,700,000 head of sheep. At the beginning of the panic of 1891 Ohio had 4,061,197 sheep, and in 1897 she had 2,368,967 sheep, a loss of a little over 1,600,000 head, with wool on the free list, thus showing that these two panics operated about equally upon the sheep industry of Ohio. These figures show conclusively that it was the panic and not the tariff which was so disastrous to the sheep of Ohio.

In 1905 Ohio had 2,601,010 sheep, notwithstanding she had had the benefit of a protective tariff for eight years on wool, at an average rate of 44.31 per cent. I desire to say to my Ohio statesmen friends that in the light of these figures you will be compelled to revise the figures in the tables which you have submitted and look to another cause affecting the fluctuation of sheep raising in your State.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I have left but a few minutes, but the gentleman was so kind in yielding to me I feel as though I would commit a crime not to yield to him.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman what year it was that we had 7,000,000 sheep?

Mr. FOWLER. In 1867.

Mr. WILLIS. There must have been a remarkable decline, because in 1860 we had 3,500,000 sheep and in 1870 we had only 4,000,000 sheep.

Mr. FOWLER. In 1867 you had 7,159,177 sheep. In 1870 you had 6,250,000 sheep. Coming on down to 1894 you had 3,765,704, when you say the Wilson bill destroyed the sheep industry in the great State of Ohio. Now, in 1910, you have but little over 3,000,000. Can you tell me what became of the difference between 3,000,000 and 7,000,000 sheep—a difference of nearly 4,000,000?

But, Mr. Chairman, I was comparing sheep raising during panics in America. Now, let us compare the total number of sheep in the United States during these two great panics. In 1870 the United States had 40,853,000 sheep, in 1872 we had 31,679,300 sheep, a loss within two years of 9,173,700 sheep, under a high protective tariff. At the beginning of the panic of 1891 we had 43,421,136 sheep, in 1897 we had 36,818,643 sheep, leaving a difference of 6,602,393 sheep, showing a loss of 2,571,307 more sheep during the panic under high protection than was lost during the panic with free wool. Let us compare the consumption of wool in this country during these two panics: In 1872 we consumed 274,022,957 pounds, about 50,000,000 pounds more than had ever been consumed before and which was not equaled until the year 1880. In 1897 we consumed in this country 601,306,208 pounds, the greatest amount ever consumed in any one year in this country.

These comparisons show that during panics, whether under high protection or under free wool, our sheep decline in number, and our consumption of wool materially increase over that of other years.

I submit the following table, Bulletin No. 68, from the United States Department of Agriculture, which is regarded as the very highest authority upon this subject.

ANOTHER REASON FOR LOSS OF SHEEP, 1893–1897.

In addition to the reasons heretofore given for the loss of sheep at various periods of our history there is the further reason of sales and killings for mutton at periods when the price of mutton is abnormally high. One of these high-priced mutton periods came in 1894, 1895, and 1896, and brought about a loss of nearly 2,000,000 sheep, just at the time that Republicans were charging a loss of sheep to the Wilson bill. The following is taken from the Yearbook of 1896 and is another answer to misleading statements of Republicans:

British imports of sheep.

1896 (9 months)	614,855

American sheep during the last three years of this period were landed in Liverpool in greater numbers than in any preceding year. The profitable market for mutton appears to have encouraged sheep growing and fattening in many of the Western States.

American yearlings and 2-year-olds commanded practically the same price as English sheep, and were sold during the year 1896 at from 14 to 16 cents a pound.

This trade might have gone on indefinitely, but for the fact that the scab appeared among one lot of sheep from America in the latter part of the year, which broke up the British importation of sheep from the United States, at about the same time that Republicans were passing the Dingley law. The exportation to Great Britain ceased, because of British antagonism to diseased American sheep, and these sheep were retained in American folds, to swell the number of sheep and indirectly aid the new tariff to make a greater showing for the American sheep industry.

The British market might have been lost under any circumstances, for it was certainly more profitable to grow sheep for the 11 and 12 cents a pound on wool, added to the price of wool for five or six years, than to grow sheep for mutton, even at advanced prices. The question remains, however, Why should 80,000,000 of people tax themselves 11 and 12 cents a pound for the sheep growers, who produced 300,000,000 pounds of wool? Why should all industries be taxed enormously and outrageously in order to foster sheep raisers? Why should the people pay sheep men a bounty on sheep and wool?

I submit the following table from the Agricultural Department of the United States, showing the number of sheep and the production of wool in this country since the year 1840:

I have always believed that the higher the rate of duty on wool and woolen products the less wool is used in making the finished product, and the high rate does not necessarily stimulate the production of wool.

I quote from the evidence of Andrew J. Solis before the Tariff Commission in December, 1908, volume 5, page 5036:

The Dingley tariff law has given the woolgrower one of the highest duties on wool ever carried by a tariff bill. With what result? In 1893 the wool clip was 348,000,000; in 1908, 298,000,000, a decrease of 50,000,000 pounds.

With reference to the use of wool in clothing, Mr. Solis said:

It may not be generally known, but it is a fact, that buyers of manufacturers establish prices which manufacturers must meet. The clothier demands cloth out of which to make a suit which he can sell at $10, and a boy's suit that he can sell for $5. The hosiery manufacturer must meet the demand for hosiery that he can sell for a certain fixed price. The underwear manufacturer must make his shirts and drawers at a given price, and so on along the line. How can it be done with wool advanced to a price equaled only since there was a premium on gold? The problem was solved by the increased use of cotton. The manufacturers of men's wear, in order to make cloth to make the suits at the price laid down by the clothiers, used pure cotton yarn and made the cloth known as cotton worsted, and for the better grade made mercerized cloth 50 per cent wool worsted yarn and 50 per cent cotton yarn. Where all-worsted yarn made entirely from wool was used the weight of the cloth has been reduced; 8, 9, 12, and 13 ounce cloth has been substituted for the regular regulation 16-ounce for the light weights; and for heavy weights, for which the regulation weight was 20 ounces, 16-ounce cloth is used; and in order to make up the lost weight in the cloth, in making the suit, heavy lining packed with cotton wadding and other substances were added, and even 13-ounce cloth has been used for heavy-weight clothing for winter. The light weights are only paper coverings, and have no wear whatever. You have heard Mr. Whitman's statement regarding cotton-warped dress goods. That means they are 50 per cent cotton and 50 per cent wool.

The hosiery manufacturer in order to meet his buyer's prices made his hosiery out of 50 per cent black-dyed cotton and 50 per cent white wool, or with one thread of cotton and one thread of worsted. The length of the hosiery has been clipped wherever possible.

This shows that the manufacturers in order to run either reduce the weight of their cloths or make them out of cotton, and the higher wool is the less wool is used. I think it is no exaggeration of fact to say that during this high-priced wool under the Dingley bill 75 per cent of the people have been clad from head to foot and from skin out in cotton, and the other 25 per cent have been cheated by having to wear paper in summer and lightweight clothes in winter.

Further on he says:

To my mind more wool will be used with wool on an 8-cent-per-pound duty basis than at 11 cents per pound duty, because prices will then be down to the established price level, and instead of woolen manufacturers being forced to use cottons all will be able to use wool.

In volume 5 of the tariff hearings, page 5276, Mr. Peter B. Worrell, a member of a large importing house, which deals also in domestic textiles, said:

I beg to call the attention of Messrs. E. T. Steel & Co. to the fact that a $12 suit under the Wilson bill is now about $16, and a $15 suit of the Wilson tariff bill is now about $20.

I quote from the tariff hearings, volume 5, page 5626, from the testimony of Edward Moir, of Marcellus, N. Y., who is a manufacturer of woolens:

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are expecting us to go it blind?

Mr. MOIR. Well, you know how it is, Mr. Chairman. A 40-cent piece of goods manufactured and sold with a profit would probably have anywhere from 10 to 15 or 20 per cent of cotton in it. It might have 30 per cent of shoddy, it might have 40 per cent of shoddy, and it might have the balance of a reasonably defective wool.

In the same tariff hearings, volume 5, page 5185, Mr. Sidney Blumenthal, of New York, submits the following statement as his views upon the question of the use of wool in the manufacture of woolen goods, which he has copied from The Textile World for January, 1909:

Examples of adulteration.

1. 28-ounce stuff, cotton-warp beaver, 75 cents a yard:
   10,000 yards, making 17,500 pounds, make up— Pounds.
   - Raw cotton — 3,611
   - Cotton warp — 1,309
   - Shoddy — 22,123
   - Fine wool — 4,886
   - Coarse wool — 1,187
2. 34-ounce Irish frieze, $1 a yard:
   10,000 yards making 21,250 pounds—
   - Grease wool — 23,625
   - Shoddy and waste — 17,719
3. 25-ounce piece-dyed kersey, $1.25 a yard:
   10,000 yards making 15,625 pounds; back warp, 40 per cent; Oregon, 60 per cent shoddy; face warp and filling, 50 per cent; California, 50 per cent shoddy—
   - Grease wool — 32,426
   - Shoddy — 13,167
4. 15½-ounce cotton-warp casket cloth, 50 cents a yard:
   - Cotton warp — 2,375
   - Grease wool — 1,600
   - Raw cotton — 1,125
   - Shoddy — 9,563

To make these 40-cent goods—the popular class—there must, on account of the high tariff rates, be an adulteration. A lowering of the tariff will permit the use of more grease wool, which is the same thing as a lowering of price. It will give the people better woolens for the same money.

These gentlemen from whom I have been quoting are men of experience in the manufacture of woolens and know full well what they are talking about. It is quite evident to all who lived during the life of the Wilson law that much more wool was used in the manufacture of woolen goods than there has been at any time since. In 1897 the statistics from the Department of Agriculture state that we consumed 601,205,008 pounds of raw wool. At that time the population of the United States, in round numbers, was about 65,000,000. Since that time we have added to our population more than 25,000,000 people, a little less than one-half of the population during the three years of the Wilson law. Add to the consumption during the life of this bill a ratio equal to the increase in population, and this would bring our consumption of wool up to between 800,000,000 and 900,000,000 pounds, whereas, as a matter of fact, in 1910 we consumed a little over 581,000,000 pounds. The difference between these figures shows how much cotton and shoddy is being sold to the people to-day for wool. Supporting the argument that the consumption of wool increases as the price of wool decreases, I submit the following table.

Quantities of wool produced, imported, exported, and retained for consumption: 1840 to 1910.[1]

Mr. Chairman, another favorite argument of the high protectionist and of these gentlemen who are opposing this bill is that of protecting American labor. We have been a long time in trying to get them to define just what they mean by the term "protection to American labor," and it was not until the campaign of 1908 that we were able to get them to define their position upon that question in writing. I quote from the Republican platform of 1908, as follows:

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

Will anyone contend that 20 per cent on raw wool is not sufficient to make up for the difference between the cost of raising wool in America and abroad? Is there a man here who will say that 42.55 per cent is not enough to make up the difference between the cost of labor in the manufacture of woolens abroad and in America? If there is, I would like for him to stand up so that I can see the color of his hair. You give me 50 yards the advantage of an automobile and I can beat it in a foot race of 100 yards. But, in fact, was the tariff on Schedule K intended to benefit American labor? Let us see what Andrew J. Solis, a woolen manufacturer, says about that. In volume 5, page 5037, of the tariff hearings before the Ways and Means Committee in December, 1908, he said, with reference to this proposition:

Who have been the real beneficiaries of the Dingley wool schedule? It has not been American labor, because many of the mills have been filled from top to bottom with foreigners, many of whom could not even speak the English language. That is why wages did not materially increase. It has not been those on fixed salaries, because no advance has been given, and instead of being better situated they were in a worse condition, because the cost of living was forced up to such an extent that the ordinary individual just about made both ends meet and had hard work at that.

This shows how much these disciples of Moorish barbarians love labor; and what is true of their practices in filling up the woolen mills with cheap foreign labor is true to a greater or less extent in all of the manufacturing centers. Instead of being a friend to American labor, these protected combines have become its worst enemies by importing the cheap pauper labor of other countries to our country to compete with the intelligent American laborer. I quote from the testimony of Henry J. MacFarland, president of M. D. Wells Co., Chicago, Ill., which is found in volume 7 of the tariff hearings, page 6869, November 28, 1908. He was asked a question by the next President of the United States, CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.]

Are you in accord with taking the tariff off of leather?
Mr. MACFARLAND. I am, sir; absolutely.
Mr. CLARK. And on boots and shoes?
Mr. MACFARLAND. I am not an exporter. The exporters have a different opinion from what I hold. I believe that this country can manufacture shoes in competition with any country on earth.

Further on he was interrogated by Mr. RANDELL of Texas, as follows:

You do not just confine that to this country, the home market, but you mean the markets of the world?
Mr. MACFARLAND. I mean the skill with which shoes are manufactured. The skilled workmen of this country can overcome the handicap of the price of foreign labor.

Again, we had distinguished gentlemen in the manufacture of iron and steel before this same committee, such as Andrew Carnegie and Charles Schwab, in which they declared that iron and steel could be manufactured in the United States cheaper than it could be in any country in the world. Now, could you have it made any broader than what these gentlemen say about the matter? Yet, in the light of this testimony, and of the long experience of men skilled in the production of the finished product in America and familiar with the cost of labor, both in America and abroad, these gentlemen here on the floor of this Chamber—gentlemen who are still wedded to the belief that they have a right to pass a law to permit a few thousand men to levy tribute upon more than 90,000,000 of intelligent people in America—stand here and try to convince us that the high rates imposed by the Payne law upon the articles made from wool are just and right. The people at the polls condemned this bill and sent new men to the Sixty-second Congress for the purpose of giving them relief, and I predict that he who fails to vote for this measure will be brought to the bar of justice at the polls in November, 1912, to answer to his constituents for his misdeed. By your conduct in the last Congress you sent many of us here to take the places of men who failed to stand up for the cause of the people, and, if you continue your policy of high protection, you will send many more men here to take your places in the Sixty-third Congress. You can't fool the people any longer. It used to be that the masses waited for their Congressman to come home to tell them what had happened in Congress, but now the intelligent masses are directing their Congressmen how to vote upon every public question which comes up affecting their interests, long before the measure comes to a vote.

Mr. Chairman, I promised not to detain these good people very long, but I fear I have not kept my word very well. I will tell you one more story, which illustrates how these fellows are trying to do the people. I once heard a story of a storekeeper who had a Swede clerk. The Swede was sent out one day to collect the bills, and when he came back the storekeeper said, "Well, Rudolph, how did you get along?" He replied, "Vell, me do purty good; me go to Shon Shones, and Shon Shones, he pay me. Me go to Sam Reynolds, and Sam Reynolds, he pay me, but me go to Patrick Malony, and Patrick Malony, he no pay me." Storekeeper: "What did Pat say about that bill, anyway?" Swede: "Vell, I dink he pay you all right." Storekeeper: "When did he say he would pay me?"

Swede: "Vell, I dink he pay you in Yanuar." Storekeeper: "Did he say he would pay me in January?" Swede: "No; he no say he pay you in Yanuar, but he say it be a damn cold day ven he pay you." [Laughter.]

So I say, Mr. Chairman, to these gentlemen who are clamoring here for time in order to defeat this bill, they are just like Patrick—it will be a cold day when they frame a bill in the interest of the people of this country. I thank you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like for the gentleman to have one more minute in order that I may make an explanation of my question. It was not my intention to intimate that the gentleman was either a protectionist or bowlegged.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not need to make any apology. It was granted long before he asked for it. He is my friend.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BOOHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11019, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

Y., January 10–12, 1911, relative to the proposed reciprocity agreement. The resolutions are short, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONGRESS OF THE KNIGHTS OF LABOR,
Albany, N. Y., June 17, 1911.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the twenty-second annual session of the Congress of the Knights of Labor, held at Albany, N. Y., January 10 to 12, 1911, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That we reaffirm our position in favor of a protective tariff, and that the board of directors be, and they hereby are, instructed to prepare and issue an address to the workers of the country calling their attention to the fact that every dollar's worth of competitive imports entering the ports of the United States displaces that amount of products manufactured in American factories, mills, and workshops by American workmen.

Resolved, That we oppose any revision of the tariff, by reciprocity or otherwise, which does not adequately protect American industrial products against the competition of foreign labor, as any downward revision of the tariff means a downward revision of wages.

Article 2 of our constitution reads:

"The particular objects for which said association is formed and for which it was organized are: To make industrial and moral worth, not wealth, the true standard of individual and national greatness; to enact into statute law the preamble of the Knights of Labor; the maintenance of a tariff policy for the protection of American labor and industry; and the retention of the American market for American products."

In accordance with the above resolutions and constitutional provision of our organization, we are opposed to House bill 4412, which is apparently designed to carry out and make effective the so-called reciprocity treaty entered into between the Canadian Government and the United States.

We will not attempt, for it would be impossible, to point out all of the objections which might be urged to its favorable consideration, for time sufficient to accomplish that end is not at our command.

We have read with great care the provisions of the proposed treaty with reference to the admission of wood pulp and paper into the United States, and we must admit that its provisions are by no means clear, and, in fact, we think will be found not to carry into effect the views of the high contracting parties. It is really bad enough as it is, but to have any mistake made about it would be worse. It must be borne in mind that the various Provinces of Canada own what is called "Crown lands," and each Province has the absolute right to determine what shall be done with its own products. The Province of Ontario about 12 years ago prohibited the exportation of any of the products of the forests in rough state to the United States. This policy was followed by the Province of Quebec just recently. The question now arises under the treaty, Just what are we getting? It does not say in expressed terms, as it should, that the benefits of the American markets shall not be open to the Canadian manufacturers of paper until all restrictions of whatsoever kind are removed by the various Provinces. On the contrary, it is quite possible, and it is our construction, that paper manufactured from wood cut on lands owned by individuals would be admissible into the United States whether the restrictions now maintained by the various Provinces are removed or not. If we are correct in this construction, the outrage of such legislation would simply be increased. The bill should at least be amended so as to leave no error in it upon this very important question, for unless the American manufacturer of paper secures a free and unlimited supply from Canada, then there is absolutely no excuse whatsoever for the terms of this treaty, so far as this industry is concerned.

There was an exhaustive inquiry made into this question of the duty on print paper by the Mann committee two years ago, and while we did not agree with the deductions and conclusions of the committee, they reported at that time that there ought to be a duty of $2 per ton on white print paper. After a very careful investigation the House agreed with the Mann committee on a $2 tariff—a ton. The bill went to the Senate, and they concluded that $4 per ton more correctly represented the required tariff, and Congress finally compromised on $3.75 per ton.

Further, we have been informed upon the best of authority that the President of the United States at that time stated that the paper makers had made a better case than anyone else who had appeared before him for a protective tariff upon their industries. The subject has since that time been referred to the Tariff Board, which during the past year has made an exhaustive inquiry into this subject, and in the final report of this commission the difference in cost of production between the two countries was stated to be $5.35 per ton.

This is one of the greatest industries—in fact, the second greatest single industry—in the United States of America. Its capital is represented by tens of millions of dollars. The amount paid yearly to the laborers is represented in millions of dollars. Its toilers are numbered by the tens of thousands. What has it done that it should be singled out from all the industries which concededly should be protected for public execution—and in behalf of our Canadian brethren and a few newspaper owners—who, through the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, under the direction of Mr. John Norris and Mr. Herman Ridder, have carried on a relentless war for the past five years to destroy the paper industry of the United States because they were not permitted to dictate the price at which print paper should be sold.

If finished paper is to be imported into this country free of duty, the great paper industry will be crippled, and the man who is a paper maker by trade has got to go to Canada to follow his trade, and take his wife and family into the wilderness to live, where there is no compulsory education law and not one of the comforts of civilization. It means the death blow to many communities clustered about the paper mills and the breaking up of American homes and migration of our skilled labor to Canada, and we are going to have a lot of mills on our hands, that won't sell for money enough to pay the bondholders, and the Canadians are going to have our business and our profits.

Reciprocity has been tried in this country several times, but has failed for good reasons. In particular has this been so, and always will continue to be so, where there exists competition between two countries in the raising or production of the same articles which are affected by reciprocity. Of necessity it is intended that when articles are placed upon the free list, or tariff greatly reduced, it must place the producer of these articles upon both sides at a disadvantage with reference to such production. Take the present proposed treaty, for example. The farmer's products of all kinds are placed upon the free list, while the Canadian manufacturer is supposed, in consideration thereof and of benefits accruing, to reduce the tariff, which is his protection, upon the articles which he produces. Nothing is placed upon the free list for the benefit of either, yet they are compelled to bear the whole burden for the alleged benefit of others. For instance, what return does the American farmer receive in consideration of the placing of all of his prducts upon the free list and which, at the same time, places him in competition with the producers of other lands? We submit that he receives nothing in return for this sacrifice on his part. He still continues to work his farm, which has cost him much more than his competitor; pays more for the wages of his farm hands and purchases all of the necessaries of life for himself and family in the highest markets of the world. No tariff is reduced on anything which he purchases, but only on that which he produces. He pays just as high prices as before on the necessaries of life. Where, then, does he come in? He simply does not come in. He is left to shift for himself as best he can, bearing the additional burdens of state for the benefit of others.

At the same time how fares it with the Canadian manufacturer? Under the provisions of this bill he is also called upon to make sacrifice. He finds that everything that he and his employees purchase has gone up in price, and, at the same time, he is forced into competition with a strong neighbor with reference to all that he produces. Clearly, these two classes of citizens, to wit, the American farmer and the Canadian manufacturer, are being discriminated against for a more favored class. In this case the American farmer is discriminated against in favor of the American manufacturer, and, on the other hand, the Canadian manufacturer is discriminated against in favor of the Canadian farmer. In other words, one class of our citizens is made to suffer a loss for the proposed benefit of another, which policy no party can stand or endure for the reason that it is grossly unfair as well as unequal treatment of our citizens who are being discriminated against. There should and must be equality of opportunity or the principle of protection must perish. We are protectionists. We believe in the principle of universal protection, but it must apply equally to all. It must apply to all parts of our common country, equally to the tillers of the soil and to those engaged in manufacture. Then the principle is safe, otherwise it must perish, for the people will no more endure half protection and half free trade than our forefathers would suffer our Nation to remain half free and half slave. It must be one or the other, and now is the time when that question is to be determined.

The human race is like a man lost in the forests; it moves in circles, but we come back to the starting point in time. So it is with reference to the Canadian reciprocity, for in 1854 a treaty was concluded between the United States and Great Britain acting in behalf of Canada which placed substantially all the products of the farm upon the free list in consideration of certain alleged concessions in favor of our manufacturing industries. This treaty was to continue for a period of 10 years and as much longer as the contracting parties should mutually agree. It is interesting to note the workings of that treaty and the results. It is sufficient to say that the imports into the United States during the time the treaty continued in force, to wit, from 1854 to 1866, increased 261 per cent. We quote the following from a report of the committee of the Canadian Privy Council, dated February 19, 1864, viz:

"It would be impossible to express in figures with any approach to accuracy the extent to which the facilities of commercial intercourse created by the reciprocity treaty have contributed to the wealth and prosperity of this Province, and it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance which the people of Canada attach to the continued enjoyment of these facilities."

While it will thus be seen that the treaty was in great favor, on account of the benefits conferred, with Canada, how is it looked upon by the people of the United States? We find that on January 18, 1865, notice was given by this country to Great Britain of its intention to abrogate the treaty on the grounds that it was "no longer for the interests of the United States to continue the same in force."

This tells the whole story, so far as the United States is concerned. The treaty lasted 12 years and came to an ignominious end on March 17, 1866, and no statesman worthy of the name has sought to revive it up to the present day.

The difficulty of such arrangements we have attempted to point out, to wit: It is impossible to deal fairly and without discrimination with our people; but, on the other hand, it favors one interest to the detriment of another, for which no party can be responsible.

In concluding this subject we desire to call the attention of the Finance Committee of the Senate to the remarks of Senator John Sherman, of Ohio, made in the Senate of the United States in 1865, when the subject of annulling the reciprocity treaty with Canada was under consideration:

"The farmer is compelled to pay tax in various forms on every commodity he consumes and on everything that he raises, while, by our treaty with Great Britain, all the products of Canada come into our markets free from duty. While this treaty stands it is a discrimination against every farmer and every mechanic and every industrial interest of the Western States. The farmer in Canada may raise his grain and produce and send it to our markets free of duty, and it pays no tax. We can not reach their railroads; we can not tax their transportation; we can not affect them in the least; and yet every interest of our farmers is taxed. It is manifest, therefore, that while we maintain our present system of internal taxation the reciprocity treaty is a direct benefit to the Canadian producer, farmer, and mechanic, and it is a discrimination against our own farmers and mechanics. It seems to me, therefore, for this reason alone, if there were no other, that this treaty ought to fall."

The same reasoning which applied then applies now with even greater force, and history will be found to be simply repeating itself.

The Canadian reciprocity bill (H. R. 4412) now pending before the Senate is the entering wedge for the destruction of the policy of protection to American labor and American industry, and we wish to be recorded as being against this bill or any similar measure which seeks to destroy the farming and manufacturing industries of the United States by turning the American market over to foreigners.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I submit an amendment, which I shall present later, to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

SOLDIER'S ROLL OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 72), which was read and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate are hereby directed to retain in the employ of the Senate those persons who served in the Union Army during the late Civil War and whose service in the Senate is satisfactory, and to continue such persons in their positions until cause for their removal shall have been reported to and approved of by the Senate and their removal directed.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 73), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee to investigate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices under Senate resolution 60, Sixty-second Congress, first session, be, and it is hereby, authorized to have printed for the use of the committee testimony, documents, and records taken and received by it in evidence.

ABOLITION OF SENATE OFFICES.

Mr. LODGE. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 74) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the offices designated as "superintendent of the folding room," "assistant postmaster and mail carrier," "clerk, compiling a history of revenue and general appropriation bills," one unemployed messenger, and one unemployed laborer, be, and are hereby, abolished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURTON. I should like to hear the enumeration of those positions again.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution proposes to abolish the office of superintendent of the folding room, no work being done by anyone under that title; the office of assistant postmaster, as no work is being done by anyone under that title; the office of clerk to compile a history of tariff and appropriation legislation, as all the appropriations are attended to by the clerks of the Appropriations Committee and the tariff work is intermittent, to be provided for by special provisions; a messengership, the holder of which is never present at the Capitol, and a laborer's position, the holder of which is never present at the Capitol.

Mr. BURTON. I do not object to the general tenor of the resolution, but I understood such changes were to take effect August 1 next, and I understand that this is to take effect immediately.

Mr. LODGE. That was in regard to details.

Mr. CURTIS. The changes which are to take effect August 1 are those known as details. I was secretary of the caucus, and that is my recollection; also the minutes show that to be the case.

Mr. LODGE. It was only in regard to details.

Mr. BURTON. I understand that one or two of these are details; one, at any rate.

Mr. LODGE. Only one may be detailed. The others certainly are not.

Mr. SMOOT. One is a detailed officer.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the resolution may go over.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I desire to inquire whether the committee is satisfied that there are no other men on the pay roll of the Senate who are not rendering any service to the Government?

Mr. LODGE. So far as I am aware there are no others on the rolls who are not doing some work.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I desire to inquire how long the condition has obtained which is described by the Senator—that is, men drawing pay and doing no work.

Mr. LODGE. I can not state how long it has obtained. I have only known of it within six weeks.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask one further question. Who is responsible for carrying on the pay roll the names of these men who are doing no work? Who has been responsible for it?

Mr. LODGE. They have been carried on the different rolls of the Senate, and I suppose it is simply because the Senate has not seen fit hitherto to examine it. I will explain it more in detail, if the Senator desires.

Mr. REED. I should like to know the names.

Mr. LODGE. The superintendent of the folding room has no existence in that capacity, but there is a man who holds that office and who is doing other work. He ought to be recorded and carried on the books for the work he does. The office offers no work. All the work of the folding room is under the superintendency of the Sergeant at Arms, and the foreman and assistant foreman are in charge of it.

The assistant postmaster has done work here and is doing work now as a messenger. But he has not been an assistant postmaster for many years. I do not know that he ever was. The clerk to compile appropriations has done work for the Finance Committee at different times on the tariff, and very excellent work, but that is work which will be provided for properly by special provision for that purpose. The messenger referred to has not been here for more than 18 months, and the laborer for not more than 2 years, on account of ill health.

Mr. REED. Have the men who have filled these positions been drawing salaries ever since?

Mr. LODGE. They have.

Mr. REED. What step is it proposed to take to recover the moneys that have been wrongfully paid or fraudulently received?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, they have not received any salaries fraudulently. They have been doing other work than that to which they were accredited with doing in three cases. In the other two cases they have been away on account of illness, I am informed, but the period has been so long that it seems impossible to those of us who investigated it to continue them on the roll further.

Mr. REED. As a matter of fact, the Government has been losing money on these positions other than those filled by the sick men. The Government has been paying out its money and not getting any return.

Mr. LODGE. On two of them it has been paying out money and getting no return.

Mr. REED. What are the names of those gentlemen?

Mr. LODGE. The messenger is named Gaskin, who was attached formerly to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the other is a laborer named James Jones.

Mr. REED. Thank you.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to ask that the resolution should go over?

Mr. BURTON. I do not anticipate that I shall oppose it, but I interpose a formal objection and ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over on the request of the Senator from Ohio.

SENATE POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. LODGE. I submit the following resolution, which will require action from the Committee to Audit and Control, and I ask that it be referred to that committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 75) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the clerk in the post office be hereafter designated as "chief clerk of the post office," and receive an annual salary of $1,800, and that the person now holding the office of assistant postmaster be appointed messenger at the card door and receive an annual salary of $1,600.

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM H. HAYWOOD, JR.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an address issued to the people of North Carolina by Hon. William H. Haywood, jr., when he resigned his seat in the Senate in 1846, and also as a part of the same document, indicating that it is a separate one, the letter of Senator Haywood to the legislature of his State, accepting his election as a Senator from the State of North Carolina. (S. Doc. No. 52.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is it the Senator wishes to have printed?

Mr. BAILEY. Senator Haywood's letter of acceptance and his answer to some rather bitter accusations against him. His resignation, of course, as the Senator from Mississippi well knows, grew out of Senator Haywood's unwillingness to support the tariff of 1846, and the administration organ—they had one in that day, they have several in this day—assailed him with vehement bitterness, and this letter is in reply to that attack. It happens, Mr. President, that it is to be found in no public or official document. I had the letter, which relates to one of the most interesting episodes in our political history, copied from the old Niles Register, and I brought it here, as copied for me by a very careful and capable gentleman, to have it printed and thus made a part of the records of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall make no objection, but it strikes me that printing as public documents things that have no present public interest, except the revival of one side of some historical strife, is setting a precedent that might lead to an infinite deal of printing.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, if any gentleman could resurrect a document as valuable as this, I think money would be well spent in printing it. It is, as I said a moment ago, of peculiar historical and political interest.

I will say to the Senator from Mississippi, however, that it does not revive any argument within our own party. It does what I find no satisfaction in doing—it shows that a great Senator was mistaken in the character and effect of a conspicuous Democratic service to the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator think he ought to bring it up against that Senator now?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I think his fame and memory can bear the burden of that one mistake. He was one of the greatest Senators who ever held a commission from that Commonwealth.

This letter is valuable in another respect. It shows that they abused and vilified Senators in 1846 just as they did in 1896 and as they do in 1911. I rather feel inclined to show that the muckrakers of this day are not without their ancestors of another day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the order to print will be entered.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the pending amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the pending amendment, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. On page 24, line 3, after the word "board," it is proposed to insert:

and when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that such wood pulp, paper and board, being the products of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that amendment was passed over at my request on Friday last because the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], whose amendment it is, was not then prepared to go on with its discussion. He is not present this morning, and I hope the amendment will be again passed over.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I imagine that the Senator from New York does not need to prepare an address to vindicate an amendment which the President himself says conforms the bill to that agreement. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to indicate that there is any serious opposition to making the law exactly what the treaty is?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I said the Senator from New York was not prepared to go on with the amendment on Friday when the bill was up. He is not here this morning. I then understood he would be ready to go on when the bill was again laid before the Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crane	Jones	Pomerene
Bailey	Crawford	Kenyon	Reed
Borah	Curtis	Kern	Shively
Bourne	Dillingham	Lippitt	Simmons
Bradley	Dixon	Lodge	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Foster	McCumber	Smoot
Bristow	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Swanson
Bryan	Gamble	Martine, N. J.	Thornton
Burnham	Gronna	Myers	Townsend
Burton	Guggenheim	Nixon	Warren
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Page	Wetmore
Chilton	Hitchcock	Penrose	Williams
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Works

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the pending amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I notice the absence of a number of Senators who in the former debate on this subject took a very active part, who, I think, might be said to be somewhat in charge of this particular item of paper and pulp and pulp wood. It seems to me that the matter ought not to be acted on at this time. Personally, I have not had an opportunity to study the amendment with reference to its effect upon the bill. When the time comes, I propose to offer an amendment which will have some little bearing upon this subject—that is, to strike out from the bill the condition that it go into effect as to paper and wood pulp and pulp wood only upon condition that Canada remove all charges of any kind on those articles.

When the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was before the Senate I opposed, and shall again oppose, the double taxation of our people. If, as a matter of fact, viewed from the standpoint of the burden of a tariff on the one hand and the necessity of protection on the other, on the fair equation of those two propositions the duty should be taken off paper, as a matter of justice to the consumer of paper, I for one can not tolerate the idea that that duty shall remain simply because Canada has put another tax upon it. That is biting off our nose to spite our face; and when that point is reached I propose to offer an amendment.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], who had this matter in charge two years ago, and who is, I think, very much interested in this item, is absent; and it does not seem to me that at this point in the debate, when everybody knows that the debate has got to continue at least for some days yet, we should take a vote upon this question this morning. I move that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts——

The VICE PRESIDENT. No motion is pending. Does the Senator from Minnesota ask unanimous consent that the amendment be passed over?

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that it be laid aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. CLAPP. I object to unanimous consent for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not require unanimous consent. It is the regular order.

Mr. CLAPP. I understood the Chair to say that the request was for unanimous consent for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no. The regular order is the consideration of the amendment, and objection is made to its being temporarily passed over. The question, therefore, is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I move, notwithstanding the objection, that the amendment be temporarily passed over. I think that motion is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that can not be done. The amendment can be discussed; it can be voted down; but the Chair thinks that it can not be moved to lay aside an amendment which is regularly in order.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Chair mean, notwithstanding a matter is regularly in order, that a motion to lay it aside is not in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not a pending amendment. The whole matter can be laid aside.

Mr. CLAPP. I can not believe that the Chair really means that a motion to lay an amendment aside would be out of order. If the Chair so rules, of course that ends the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota first rose. The Chair will recognize that Senator and then recognize the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have no desire, of course, to be even seemingly discourteous to any Senator, nor have I any desire to push things with undue haste; but it seems to me that, although the Senate is a highly deliberative body, when it is not ready to talk and deliberate business might be attended to. I am perfectly willing to take advantage of this opportunity—and I especially call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the matter—to suggest that perhaps we might agree now upon a time at which the vote could be taken upon this amendment and upon the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. That can be disposed of now, as I, for one, will object. I did not ask that the amendment go over to-day on my account, but on account of Senators who are absent and who, I know, are interested and I believe want to be here. It is not fair to them.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. For a question. Does the Senator from Mississippi think it would be quite the thing to push this matter now, with the author of the amendment absent from the Chamber temporarily?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not disposed to push it provided a willingness is shown to agree now to some date—I do not care when—not too remote, when the Senate can vote upon the bill and the amendment.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit me, the Senator from New York is not here, but I have no doubt he will be here in a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I have just learned that the Senator from New York is in the Capitol, and I have no doubt will be here in a moment.

Mr. WARREN. He is not present here now to speak for his amendment, which is before the Senate, and to lay it aside for the moment until he can return would be according to the practice of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the whole country is waiting out of doors for the result of this vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Two countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Many of those who are opposed to Canadian reciprocity have said that the business of the country was actually being disturbed because of the agitation of this question, and it seems to me that we ought to be able to agree upon a date at which a vote can be taken upon the bill and the amendments. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is in control of the bill—I have no wish to put my oar in, but I have gotten into it accidentally by the suggestion I made—that probably such a consent could now be obtained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has given notice that he would object to any such agreement being made to-day, as the Chair understood.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would ask the Senator from Minnesota this question, then: If I withdraw the objection which I have made, then will the Senator from Minnesota consider the question of consenting to a day for a vote?

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Minnesota personally has no interest in the postponement of this amendment. It was in behalf of Senators who are absent that he urged postponement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this is my first term in the Senate of the United States, and in view of the fact that I am not in charge of the bill and therefore might possibly by my insistence put myself in a false attitude, I shall not insist upon the objection. But I do suggest that it is time that some effort was being made to arrive at an agreement as to a date for a vote upon the bill and amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi withdraws his objection to the request that the amendment be temporarily passed over.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not wish, so far as I am concerned, that this amendment shall interfere in any way with progress upon this bill or the disposition of the bill. It was my purpose this morning to give notice that on Wednesday of this week, day after to-morrow, at the close of the routine business, with the permission of the Senate, I should make some remarks upon the reciprocity agreement and incidentally upon the committee amendment to which my name has been popularly attached. Unless that is at odds with the purpose of the Senate, I now give that notice.

In the meantime, Mr. President, as I understand, there is no other amendment pending?

Mr. SMOOT. This is the committee amendment.

Mr. ROOT. This is the committee amendment. I see no reason why the bill should not be reported to the Senate. I can say whatever I have to say upon it just as well in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and, so far as I am concerned, although I have no right to say anything about the progress of the bill, for it is in the hands of the committee, I shall have no objection whatever to the bill being reported to the Senate, letting the discussion upon that or any other amendment come up in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment, please. The Chair understands that the Senator from Minnesota has asked unanimous consent that the amendment be temporarily passed over. To that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] objected. He has now withdrawn the objection. Is there any other objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is temporarily passed over.

Mr. ROOT. Then I give the notice of which I spoke, that at the close of the routine business on Wednesday, with the permission of the Senate, I will make some remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator whether the amendment which he proposes is in harmony with the original agreement between the Canadian commissioners and the United States?

Mr. ROOT. It was not my purpose to go into a discussion of the merits of the amendment to-day, but I am quite ready to answer the Senator's question. This amendment, which is proposed by the committee and which is attributed to me because I suggested it, I believe, to the committee, simply makes the bill conform to the reciprocity agreement and has no other purpose or effect.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from New York know whether the bill now pending in the Canadian Parliament contains the provision recommended by the committee and urged by the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. I do not.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that the bill in the Canadian Parliament requires that the provision shall not take effect until the various Provinces have agreed not to place an export duty upon the articles contained in it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the bill in the Canadian Parliament repeats exactly the proviso in the agreement submitted by the President. The Root amendment, in effect, reproduces that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, so far as we are advised, the bill now pending in the Canadian Parliament giving effect to this arrangement is in exact harmony with the original understanding, and neither with respect to pulp wood nor print paper has it been changed in any particular from that understanding. The changes have been made by the House of Representatives and enlarge the rights of Canada beyond the treaty agreement to the detriment of the American people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments to be offered to the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make a suggestion in connection with that matter. There seems to be an impression that the Canadian Parliament is subject to the will of the Provinces in regard to foreign commerce. There is no foundation for such a conclusion. The constitution granted to the Provinces expressly excludes that subject. It is all a sham and a pretense that we hear about the necessity for the Government of Canada to have the consent of her Provinces in making any such treaty.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, the Provinces have complete control over Crown lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is a question of a tariff regulation governing commerce——

Mr. LODGE. But nine-tenths of the wood and wood pulp comes from wood cut on Crown lands——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another question.

Mr. LODGE. Which those Provinces control.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another question.

My remarks grew out of the suggestion of the Senator with reference to the right of Canada to make this tariff arrangement. I say it is absolute, and it is not subject to the consent of or to be withheld by any Province in Canada. The ownership of the lands is another question.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Kansas said nothing about the action, power, or the rights of the Canadian Government. He simply repeated what he understood was one of the provisions of the bill which is pending in the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. HEYBURN. If such a provision is pending, it is voluntary and may perhaps be introduced as an excuse on the part of Canada that she is not absolutely free to make any arrangement with a foreign country with reference to commerce, which, of course, includes the making of tariff regulations.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the provision I have referred to. I have not a copy of the bill on my desk, but I want it printed so that the RECORD may show just what the provision is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter is as follows:

Provided, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I can shorten this matter by reading into the RECORD the provision of the Canadian bill with which the chairman of the Committee on Finance has provided us. After providing that pulp of wood, mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached or unbleached, and so forth, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, this proviso is added:

Provided, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the provision.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So it appears to be an absolute agreement on the part of the Canadian Government to admit our paper, our wood pulp, and our pulp wood free into Canada, provided we admit it free into the United States.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee, or of some individual member of the Finance Committee, whether or not the so-called Root amendment was unanimously reported by the committee for adoption, and whether or not there was any report from the committee as to the wisdom or the folly of adopting the Root amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the so-called Root amendment was not unanimously adopted by the Finance Committee. I do not recollect the vote, and I do not suppose it is material on the question. So far as the fact that it was put into the bill by a majority vote constitutes a recommendation, the amendment has that recommendation.

Mr. DIXON. There was no reason stated to the Senate in reporting the bill why the Root amendment should be adopted.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from New York was before the committee and made a very able address to the committee, which persuaded a majority to vote to put it in the bill.

Mr. DIXON. What I want to know is whether or not there is any information filed with the Senate from the Finance Committee why the Root amendment should be engrafted onto the original bill.

Mr. PENROSE. There is, in the hearings had before the committee, containing the address of the Senator from New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is fully stated there.

Mr. PENROSE. It is fully stated there.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest to the Senator from Montana that the strongest possible argument that could be adduced is in print, and he will find it in the agreement between the United States and Canada.

Mr. DIXON. But the Finance Committee has made no statement whatever to the Senate on the Root amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Those of us who favor that amendment hardly think it necessary to make more than a mere suggestion that for some inscrutable reason the other House dropped from the bill that provision in the agreement. The Canadian Parliament has retained it in its bill.

Mr. PENROSE. On page 574 of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate the Senator from Montana will find the address of the Senator from New York fully setting forth all the facts in this case.

Mr. DIXON. As I understand, the Finance Committee was not unanimous in the case of the Root amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I have already stated it was not, and it was so published in the newspapers at the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Senator from Montana inquired whether there is anything coming from the committee which sets forth the reasons for the action which the different members of the committee took concerning the Root amendment, or has he asked whether there was any report from the committee as a whole?

Mr. DIXON. Any report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no report from the committee as a whole. But some of us in a very modest way undertook to tell why the bill ought to pass and why we thought the Root amendment should not be adopted and why its adoption would result in the indefinite, if not the perpetual, exclusion of print paper and wood pulp and pulp wood from Canada into the American market. In making that report we took the liberty of quoting the strongest possible statement and argument on that side of the case, to wit, part of a speech of the President of the United States, who has very much at heart the success of this negotiation, made at Chicago on a very recent date; and the Senator will find that published for perusal.

Mr. DIXON. As I understand, the President of the United States has made a report of his own against the Root amendment.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is curious to know why the majority of the Finance Committee did not accompany the bill with a report. While I sympathize with the Senator's curiosity, I must be permitted to remind him that this course is not without precedent. In fact it seems to be growing unfashionable to file majority reports. The more important the measure the less likelihood apparently of a presentation of an explanatory majority report. Minority views are frequently submitted, but for some reason, as the bill rises in importance the majority seem to prefer to report it without assigning reasons for its passage. In illustration of this, I recall to the Senator's attention the fact that the tariff bill of 1909 was brought into the Senate by the Finance Committee unaccompanied by any report whatever. That bill contained between four and five thousand items of taxation, and was in all respects a measure of capital importance to the country. Yet not a word of committee explanation attended its presentation to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is hardly a sufficient answer on the part of the chairman of the committee to the query of the Senator from Montana to say that certain pages of the record fully set forth the reasons that were urged for the adoption of what is known as the Root amendment; and it is but fair to the Senator from Montana to say that the only reasons which were urged in its favor were these: First, that the present bill as it passed the House did not conform either to the agreement that was entered into between this country and Canada or to the bill as introduced in the Canadian Parliament; second, possibly which was more important, that under the bill as it now stands we will receive Canadian paper free into the States of New York and Maine. But the paper manufactured in Maine and New York may not go into Canada free. That is the present condition of the bill.

Mr. DIXON. But——

Mr. McCUMBER. Now just one moment. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] gave reasons or suggested that there were other reasons which those who voted against this amendment would have in reference to the righteousness of their vote.

But, Mr. President, I was among those who voted in the committee against the adoption of the Root amendment. I did not consider that it was very important because there are but two great States in this Union which are specially interested in the manufacture of print paper. Those States are New York and Maine; and I am speaking of those two specially. I understand that the representatives from the State of New York will vote for this agreement whether the Root amendment goes into it or not. They would prefer to have the amendment in, but if it does not go in, they will vote for the bill; and I further understand that the representative from Maine in the Senate of the United States who represents the latest expression of sentiment from the State of Maine will also vote for this agreement whether the Root amendment is adopted or not.

Now, my view of it was that inasmuch as these two States would be perfectly satisfied with this agreement and would vote for this agreement without the Root amendment—an agreement that would say that the product of Canada should come into New York free, but that the product of New York should not go into Canada free—I was perfectly willing that they should vote for it in that particular condition; and, in fact, I preferred that if they desired to vote for it that it should be passed in a way and in such a form that the products of New York and Maine could not go into Canada free and the products of Canada could go into Maine and New York free, because in voting for this bill they are voting for exactly the same kind of conditions in my State. The products of North Dakota, Minnesota, Montana, and South Dakota can not go into Canada free because of the conditions, whereas the articles produced in Canada adjoining those States can come into this country free.

I am willing to let the bill go through with the same idea of reciprocity as it affects Maine and New York that it does when it affects North Dakota, South Dakota, and——

Mr. BAILEY. That is the reason you voted against the Root amendment.

Mr. DIXON and Mr. BAILEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. In view of the very lucid statement of the Senator from North Dakota—and I am certainly obliged to him personally that some one has explained this measure—that this so-called treaty is not reciprocity so far as Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana are concerned, and is not for our agricultural products——

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I do not want it to be reciprocity for the other States.

Mr. DIXON. And is not reciprocity for Maine and New York, so far as the paper men are concerned, how comes this bill to be called a reciprocity bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Let New York and Maine take care of themselves.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to have that information.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like to translate into the ideas that are created in my mind by the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota his reason for voting against this amendment. It appears to be that he wants this bill to be as bad as possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. It can not be much worse.

Mr. ROOT. He knows that the bill without the amendment departs from the reciprocity agreement. He knows that the amendment makes the bill conform to the reciprocity agreement, and because the amendment will make the bill square with the reciprocity agreement he is against the amendment.

Mr. President, it stands with perfect clearness that the second section of the bill, the section which alone relates to pulp and paper, is not a reciprocity bill. It is——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Excuse me one moment, Senator. It is not the provision of the reciprocity agreement. It may be a better provision than is contained in the agreement. The Senator from Mississippi thinks it is a better provision, but it is not the same provision; it is a different provision. Instead of being a provision for reciprocity, it appears to be a simple provision to remove our duties upon these articles because we wish to remove them, with no reciprocal compensation whatever.

I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the Senator from New York if it is not true that the President opposed this amendment, and it was so announced in the press within the last few days?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has the same access to the columns of the press that I have. I prefer not to discuss upon the floor of this Chamber the question as to what the President of the United States has said or done in regard to a measure pending here, except as he has expressed himself in his messages to Congress. I do not think it is a good practice. I do not think it comports with that independence and dignity of consideration and action which we owe to the office of the Senate to base our considerations upon what this or that or the other person or newspaper may have reported as to what the President has said.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Kansas asked the question of the Senator from New York because he understood the Senator from New York to be criticizing those Senators who oppose his amendment, saying that they wanted it defeated because they might make a bad measure of the bill, and I desired to call attention to the fact that the President, who recommended the passage of the measure, was against his amendment. I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from New York, because I am opposed to the agreement.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question.

Mr. ROOT. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to make an observation regarding what the Senator from Kansas has said? I have criticized no Senators, Mr. President, for opposing this amendment. I merely stated, and stated, I think, accurately, the position of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator just allow me to analyze his position for one minute?

Mr. ROOT. Allow me to finish my sentence. I do not think that other Senators oppose this amendment because they think the bill will be a better one without it. I impute no motives to any Senator and criticize no Senator.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield, and to whom?

Mr. BAILEY. I want a moment with the Senator from New York before he turns his attention to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. ROOT. I yield first to the Senator from Texas and then to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from New York certainly does not insist that it is essential to true reciprocity that the agreement between the contracting nations shall relate to the same articles. As I read the history of the Republican Party, their reciprocity always related to different articles. In other words, reciprocity, as invented and as patented by them, was that this Nation, in exchange for a market for some article which we produce, would invite the contracting nation to our markets with some article which we do not produce. Surely it is not essential to true reciprocity, according to the Republican idea, that it shall relate to the same article.

I think the Senator from New York is right about the Senator from North Dakota. I think the Senator from North Dakota believes that this agreement is so bad if he can make it still a little worse he might defeat it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. But I may be mistaken.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Texas is entirely mistaken as to my position. I have not the slightest hope on earth to defeat the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will revise what I said.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will give my reasons in a moment.

Mr. BAILEY. I will revise what I said and say despairing of its defeat, you want to make it as bad as you can so as to make it odious as soon as you can. My own philosophy is that our real duty is to make a bad thing a little better instead of much worse.

I voted for this amendment, although I want to be frank with the Senate. If they will propose some amendment that will defeat the bill, that amendment will command my earnest support, because, if I could defeat this agreement I would feel that I had done my country a service. But knowing that I can not defeat it, I was rather inclined myself to make it as little objectionable as I could, and in the committee, if I may be permitted to reveal the secrets of the committee room, I voted for the amendment.

If the Senator will excuse me, I want to say one word more in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from New York that we ought not to discuss what the President of the United States has said. My answer is that if it is not proper for us here to discuss what he has said, it was not proper for him to say that anywhere. It will be a long time before I will consent that the President of the United States may traverse this country and discuss matters pending in either House of Congress and still be exempt from such answer as we can make to what he has said.

If the President employs his constitutional means of communication with the two Houses, then the two Houses will confine themselves to his communications, made under and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States; but when the President of the United States speaks, as he did at Chicago, and declared that the purpose of that speech was to induce the public to put pressure on the Senate, he invites a discussion of what he said; and, for my part, I intend to address myself at some length to that remarkable speech of his—remarkable in many respects, but most remarkable of all in that particular paragraph, where, attempting to answer the charge of inconsistency, he involved himself in the most obvious inconsistency that can be found in a presidential document from the beginning of the Government to this day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will be glad if both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas will let me restate my position. It is that the reciprocal idea, if there is any such, in this bill shall apply with the same force and effect in the State of New York as it does in the States of North Dakota and Minnesota.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in just one moment. Then if the provisions are not reciprocal and just the sooner will they be made reciprocal and just.

I merely want to analyze for one moment the position of the Senator from New York. He says I want to have this bill as bad as possible. If his amendment is not adopted, I understand that he will vote for the bill. Then, Mr. President, the Senator from New York purposes to vote for this bill when it is just as bad as it is possible for it to be. That certainly is a position that I do not want to take. If the nonsupport of his amendment will make the bill as bad as it is possible for the bill to be, then it seems to me that the Senator from New York should join us and vote against it and get a bill that may have more of the elements of true reciprocity, as we understand it from a Republican standpoint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], who has risen?

Mr. ROOT. In a moment. I do not want to get too far away from the point I am discussing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I thought I yielded to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the contrary, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] had spoken.

Mr. ROOT. It is immaterial. What I mean to say is that the Senator from North Dakota is right in supposing that I shall vote for this bill whether this amendment goes on or not. I shall vote for it because I think the bill has a value to the whole country sufficient to overbear and counterbalance any injury or injustice that may be involved in the omission of the reciprocal quality in the provision regarding pulp paper. But I would like to see the bill I mean to vote for made as good as possible. I am going to vote for it because it is a measure of reciprocity, and I should like to see it made in every part a true measure of reciprocity.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I am going to vote for it because I want the agreement with Canada put into force. I should like to see this bill put that agreement into force as it was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROOT. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the Senator from New York explain what reciprocity there is in the bill for the farmers. Does he expect that the farmers will get any market to any appreciable extent for their agricultural products in Canada?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. The Senator asks me a question. I answer, I do. I think there will be a very substantial measure of reciprocity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota that exactly what I have been driving at for two or three days here is to get the Finance Committee to explain to the Senate where the reciprocity comes into this bill.

Mr. NELSON. For the farmer?

Mr. DIXON. For the farmer. Why it is that they label a measure reciprocity which forces every farmer in this country to sell all of his products in a free-trade market and purchase all of his things that he buys in a highly protected market. How a bill of that kind coming from a Republican Finance Committee can carry the label of reciprocity upon it puzzles my brain. I have tried my best to get some information from them.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. NELSON. I see the Senator from Massachusetts has risen.

Mr. DIXON. I will be happy to hear from him.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rose in order to call attention to something said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who, I am sorry to see, has left his seat. He referred to reciprocity agreements hitherto made, and said that in those agreements it was not a case of reciprocity in the same article, but admission free or at low duty; that one article was balanced, perhaps, by the admission free or at low duty of a different article. That is very true, but those agreements were all, so far as I remember, treaties, and in a treaty, as in the case of Cuba and Hawaii, against the admission of sugar at reduced duty or free they took our manufactured articles at a reduced duty or free, and one was held to balance the other, and, I think, correctly held.

I call attention to this point, Mr. President, because it involves what we must sooner or later consider here very carefully—the question of the favored-nation clause in this bill. This is the distinction I desire to make at this time. In the bill, which is not a treaty, where paper is set off against some other totally different article, each article is set off against the same article. The bill proceeds item by item, wheat against wheat, barley against barley, agricultural implements, and so on all down the list; each one is reciprocal. We take the Canadian free or at a certain duty and they take ours, and they are put in the same list. Therefore, when you get to paper, under the head "wood pulp and paper," which is the head in the bill, there and there alone you find an article for which there is no set-off, because the other articles are all provided for one by one as you go down through the list.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question right at that point?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understood the Senator to say a few moments ago, when he was on the floor before, that a very large portion of the wood pulp and pulp wood imported into this country from Canada came from the Crown lands.

Mr. LODGE. I did.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the correspondence, as I recall the fact, Mr. Fielding and his associate protected themselves by declaring that Canada would not undertake through this legislation, which the Senator from Nebraska has read a moment ago, to deliver——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me finish my sentence. They would not agree to make good this pledge so far as it affects pulp wood and wood pulp on the Crown lands of the Provinces.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has raised that point. Under the negotiations, as stated in the letter of the Canadian commissioners, and in the agreement which was submitted to Congress, the balancing between wood pulp and paper on the one side and wood pulp and paper on the other was the same, because certain conditions are recognized. They did not say simply wood pulp and paper as they say barley without any other conditions at all, but they said under certain conditions wood pulp and paper shall come in free from Canada, and under certain conditions wood pulp and paper shall go free from the United States into Canada. So there were two balanced items. If the Provinces refused to comply with the wishes of the Dominion Government, both those items drop out; but they are reciprocal all through.

The point I was trying to make was that under this arrangement the item of wood pulp and paper as it stands in the bill passed by the House is an item which has no balancing return; there is no equivalent; and it comes, it seems to me, under the definition which John Quincy Adams made in 1817 of a gratuitous concession. I am not prepared absolutely to say that that is the case, but I am very strongly of that opinion.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will come back to that in a moment. I want to finish this point.

The American doctrine has always been that reciprocal agreements do not invade the favored-nation clause. I think the American doctrine has been perfectly sound, and the European doctrine has been full of contradictions in their efforts to get around their theory. Our doctrine, however, has always been, since John Quincy Adams laid it down in 1817, that a gratuitous concession is that which comes within the favored-nation clause. If you give one nation some particular favor of any kind, no matter whether or not it is a lowering of duties, that comes within the favored-nation clause. I think there can be no question about the doctrine that we have always held. The only question to be decided here is whether this item, as it now stands, stripped of its equivalent, as it is by the House bill, does not come within the classification of a gratuitous concession. If it does, then this comes within the favored-nation clause.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. BAILEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I wanted to follow the question I raised a moment ago, which the Senator has not touched upon very much as yet, and that is this: If our chief supply of pulp and pulp wood from Canada must come from Crown lands controlled by the Provinces, in regard to which they can in their local legislatures impose export duties, and Canada has not undertaken, through her Dominion Parliament, to answer for those Provinces, may this not be, after all, an entirely futile agreement so far as getting from Canada any considerable supply of wood pulp and pulp wood is concerned, because the power to control its exportation into the United States is in those local Provinces?

Mr. LODGE. That is absolutely true. I was directing my remarks only to the technical question of reciprocity as applied to the treaty.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not true, then, that there is an immense amount of sham in this whole proposition, which is being held out to the American people as a promise for enlarging the wood pulp and pulp wood supply?

Mr. LODGE. That is too large a question for me to reply to.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rather agree both with the general American doctrine and with the statement which he quotes from John Quincy Adams; but this is not a gratuity. I am perfectly satisfied that it is not an equivalent, but it is still a consideration; in other words, they get unrestricted free trade in wood pulp and print paper with the United States, while we get but a limited trade there. I think it might be considered a consideration without being an equivalent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that is precisely my point, if the Senator will allow me. They get free trade under certain conditions. We can not, as the matter now stands, get free trade into Canada on wood pulp or paper under any conditions, while heretofore we could get in under certain conditions, and it was an unquestionable equivalent.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not so sure, at least I am not ready at this minute to agree that there is no condition under which we might not have a limited concession from Canada, although even that I state with reserve.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator means as it stands in the House bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I can not see where the equivalent comes in.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no equivalent, but there may be a consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I mean there is no ostensible equivalent.

Mr. BAILEY. Equivalent implies value for value.

Mr. LODGE. I mean ostensible equivalent.

Mr. BAILEY. A consideration.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Texas?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York for that purpose?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Texas would study the second section of the bill as it came from the other House, without the proposed amendment. He will find that that section will take effect whether Canada adopts or rejects the reciprocity agreement, whether Canada enacts any legislation or not. The instant the President's signature is put to the bill the duties upon these articles of pulp and paper, the products of Canada coming into the United States, are removed, subject to certain specified conditions.

Mr. BAILEY. And in that contingency I think obviously every country with whom we have a treaty containing the favored-nation clause will be entitled to the same treatment, but I am contemplating a situation in which both Governments approve this treaty.

Mr. ROOT. Well, we can not tell what Canada is going to do. We can not tell whether she will enact legislation on the basis of this agreement or not; but unless this amendment to the second paragraph of that section of the bill is enacted, we establish free trade in paper and pulp without any reference to anything coming to us from Canada.

Mr. BAILEY. Under that condition I agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has intimated; indeed, I feel sure that under that condition we establish the same rights in all nations having a treaty with the favored-nation clause that we accord to Canada; but in what I have said I have assumed that the two countries would approve this treaty.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina has long been asking the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to clear the point as to which the Senator from New York and the Senator from Massachusetts have been answering the Senator from South Dakota, as well as some others, in reference to what were the conditions which this proposed relation has to wood pulp. On page 2 of the message of the President of January 26, 1911, Messrs. Fielding and Paterson outlined definitely and clearly the situation.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. With the permission of the Senator, I ask to have that portion of the message read and incorporated at this point.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so, although I am entirely familiar with it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Some other Senators are not, and I should like to have the matter incorporated in the RECORD at this point. Without objection, I shall have it read and so incorporated, beginning at section 10, with reference to wood pulp, and going down to section 11.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

10. With respect to the discussions that have taken place concerning the duties upon the several grades of pulp, printing paper, etc.—mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, bleached and unbleached, news-printing paper, and other printing paper, and board made from wood pulp, of the value not exceeding 4 cents per pound at the place of shipment—we note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands. The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative. Whether the provincial governments will desire to in any way modify their regulations with a view to securing the free admission of pulp and paper from their Provinces into the markets of the United States must be a question for the provincial authorities to decide. In the meantime the present duties on pulp and paper imported from the United States into Canada will remain. Whenever pulp and paper of the classes already mentioned are admitted into the United States free of duty from all parts of Canada, then similar articles, when imported into the United States, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that last sentence——

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was absent when this debate began, and therefore I do not know just how it arose. Is the amendment reported by the committee the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been temporarily passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. And therefore the debate, strictly speaking, is not on that amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the amendment itself has been passed over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been temporarily passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I am on my feet I want to ask one question, not for the purpose of entering into the debate, but to see whether I fully understand the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I yield, but I should like to finish what I have to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator from New York say——

Mr. LODGE. I object, Mr. President, to asking a question of the Senator from New York. That can be done in the time of the Senator from New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator from Massachusetts say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts further yield now?

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I really want the information, and I do not ask the question for the purpose of argument.

Mr. LODGE. If I have the information, the Senator shall have it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator from Massachusetts say or did he hear the Senator from New York say [laughter] that if the amendment which is commonly known throughout the country as the Root amendment is adopted and the bill is passed as otherwise reported by the committee, wood pulp and print paper can be imported free from all the world?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from New York to say that if this bill passes and Canada takes no action upon it whatever the provision about wood pulp and paper will stand as a law of the United States admitting those articles from Canada into the United States under certain conditions, those conditions being dependent upon the provincial restrictions.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that section 2 will become a law and no other part of the bill will if Canada fails to act in the matter?

Mr. LODGE. Section 2 will become a law, no matter what happens to the rest of the bill, the moment it receives the signature of the President. There is no reciprocity whatever about section 2.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true of the whole bill, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am not discussing that. Section 2 is an independent section, and the moment the President's signature is attached to the bill that section is the law of the United States, without regard to the action of Canada.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I question that construction.

Mr. LODGE. That is my impression. I may be wrong in my construction, but it is the construction of a good many people who have examined the subject pretty carefully.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to finish what I have in mind, and then I will yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts prefers not to yield.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the waiving of this export duty is not in the nature of a reciprocal concession?

Mr. LODGE. I can not see how it is in the nature of a concession at all. We have no relations with the Provinces of Canada. The Provinces of Canada are unknown, except when they are needed to interfere with negotiations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The fact is that the testimony before the Committee on Finance shows that one reason why the manufacture of paper in the United States is expensive, and costs possibly more than in Canada, is because of the fact that the cost of the material here is higher, and one reason why the cost of the material is higher is that Canada, or the Provinces of Canada, maintain export duties. Now, I should like to ask the Senator, if that export duty is waived and those raw materials are given to our manufacturers at a lower price, whether that is not in the nature of a reciprocal concession which will benefit those manufacturers?

Mr. LODGE. Most of the restrictions are absolute restrictions. I do not think the export duties are very significant. They are mostly restrictions on the export of pulp and pulp wood, but not on paper. New Brunswick, encouraged by our legislation, has just passed a highly restrictive bill.

The point I desired to make, Mr. President, was in regard to the character of this amendment, internationally considered. As will be seen from what has been read from Mr. Fielding, he recognizes in the last sentence the reciprocal character of the agreement. He says no agreement can be made, because we ask certain things from the Canadian Provinces, and it is for them to settle that matter, exactly as if Canada came to us and we said, "We can not give you this, because the different States may not agree to it." Nobody on earth will treat with us in that way. We have to treat as a single government. Canada treats as far as she can go, and then the Provinces appear, and she says, "I can not control the Provinces." Therefore we have put in these conditions on the action of the Provinces.

The question is, Does that leave this a gratuitous concession, or can an equivalent of some sort or a consideration of some sort be worked out for it? I think it comes dangerously near a gratuitous concession. If it is a gratuitous concession, then of course it opens up the question of the favored-nation clause. If I am not misinformed, Germany and France and some other countries are already preparing to make claims under the favored-nation clause in regard to the arrangement now pending. That is a mere public rumor that I have heard.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. Conceding that it is a gratuitous concession—I do not agree that it is, as a matter of fact—but conceding that it is and it opens up to our people free paper from the world, that is an additional reason why it ought to be passed by Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, it would destroy every paper-making establishment in the United States.

Mr. BROWN. That it will open up free paper from the world is another reason why this particular section ought to be supported without amendment. As I understand the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. We can do it much more simply, without involving ourselves with other nations, by simply enacting a law without any reference to Canada making wood pulp and paper free.

Mr. BROWN. That is what I think this bill does.

Mr. LODGE. That would meet the Senator's views and there would be no international complication. I am not arguing the economic side of it at all.

Mr. BROWN. That is just exactly what I think this amendment does; but even if it goes further and does what the Senator says it would do—open our market to the paper of the world—that would be, to my mind, an additional reason for its approval. What I wanted to ask the Senator is this: He is emphasizing what would happen to us with the Root amendment defeated——

Mr. LODGE. I have only pointed out what international complication I thought might arise.

Mr. BROWN. That is the branch the Senator has been discussing. Now, I want to ask him what will be the result to the consuming public of print paper if the Root amendment is adopted and it becomes a law?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that it will have the slightest effect one way or the other, for I do not think the Provinces are going to remove their restrictions.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, that is just it; that is the truth about it. With the Root amendment adopted, the condition of the paper trade and pulp-wood trade in this country remains where it is to-day.

Mr. LODGE. No——

Mr. BROWN. That is, at the mercy of this combination.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that. I understood the Senator to ask what would happen if the bill were passed without the Root amendment.

Mr. BROWN. No; you discussed that question. Then I asked you——

Mr. LODGE. No; I have not discussed it. Let me answer, so there can be no misunderstanding. I believe, without the Root amendment, owing to the provincial restrictions, that the agreement will have little or no effect on articles from Canada—I am not speaking of other countries, but from Canada.

Mr. BROWN. I was going to say, if the other position of the Senator was right, if it opens up free paper from all the world, it would have considerable effect.

Mr. LODGE. No, no.

Mr. BROWN. Let us get to the question. What will happen to the paper trade in this country if the Root amendment is adopted?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it will have the slightest effect.

Mr. BROWN. That is the point. It will have none.

Mr. LODGE. No. I do not think it will change the situation. The Senator is asking me questions and then putting answers into my mouth.

Mr. BROWN. No.

Mr. LODGE. I did not make such an answer as that. I say if the Root amendment is adopted, it will not change the situation except to give us reciprocity, if reciprocity is ever possible.

Mr. BROWN. Let me ask the Senator again (so that we will not have any more misunderstanding) what will happen to the paper trade in America if the Root amendment is adopted?

Mr. LODGE. It will benefit just as much as if it was not.

Mr. BROWN. Will it change conditions at all so far as the paper trade in this country is concerned?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely, because if the Provinces——

Mr. BROWN. In what respect?

Mr. LODGE. If the Provinces remove their restrictions it will make paper free.

Mr. BROWN. You know they are not likely to remove them.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Root amendment will not affect it.

Mr. BROWN. That is the purpose of the Root amendment.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is not. Leave out the Root amendment; keep on the provincial restrictions; and the clause is not worth a snap of your finger. The Root amendment is not going to stop anybody getting free pulp or paper. It only gives us a poor, miserable chance to put ours into Canada.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Nebraska let me ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from Massachusetts needs assistance, I am willing he should have it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not need any assistance, nor does the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think it will take us both to answer satisfactorily the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts consent that the Senator from Texas make an inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I do, with great pleasure.

Mr. BROWN. I consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if it is not true that he is in favor of free print paper and free wood pulp from all the world?

Mr. BROWN. I am; absolutely.

Mr. BAILEY. Without any equivalent or consideration?

Mr. BROWN. I am.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. BROWN. Do I not have something to say about interrupting me?

Mr. LODGE. No; I have the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Texas. I now claim the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask a question?

Mr. LODGE. No; let me get through.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yielded to the Senator from Texas. If he has concluded, I desire to resume.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask another question. The Senator from Nebraska says he is in favor of repealing the 10 per cent duty on wood pulp and print paper, which is used by a very small class of our people. I want to ask him now if he is also willing to reduce the duty on woolen goods from 95 to 42 per cent?

Mr. BROWN. If it will ease the mind of the Senator from Texas at all, I am glad to inform him that I shall vote at the first opportunity I have for a reduction in the tariff on woolens.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator be willing to apply the same rule to woolen goods that he applies to wood pulp and print paper and put them on the free list?

Mr. BROWN. That is a question which is not before us; but I say to the Senator from Texas for his own personal gratification that I am for a very substantial reduction in the duty on woolen goods.

Mr. BAILEY. If I can record enough Senators on the other side in the same way we will have the woolen bill passed before August comes.

Mr. LODGE. If we are going to have free wood and free pulp and free print paper from all the world, and make that change in tariff law, that is all right. That is an economic proposition, and will stand on its merits, and will be perfectly fair and understood. But what I am getting at is the reciprocal element in this thing. If we are going to make a reciprocal agreement let it be a reciprocal agreement. If the present wood pulp and paper clause stands as it came from the House, it will, under certain conditions, admit pulp and paper into this country free——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I am going to finish this sentence. I believe under certain conditions that it would come in free. But I do not believe the Provinces are going to withdraw their restrictions. That clause is valueless without the removal of the provincial restrictions.

But the Root amendment does not complicate it in the slightest degree. Putting on the Root amendment will not prevent free wood pulp and print paper, about which the Senator from Nebraska is so extremely solicitous. It will just as well with the Root amendment as without it. The Root amendment simply furnishes the reciprocal quality to that section.

I shall vote for this bill whether the Root amendment is adopted or not, because I believe, as does the Senator from New York, that it will be on the whole a beneficial measure, for reasons which I will undertake to state later, if I have an opportunity.

I only desired to-day to call attention to some of the complications involved in this particular clause and also to emphasize the fact that the Root amendment, if I may quote the language of the President, is in exact conformity with the agreement.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I am not on the Finance Committee, and consequently have not given this bill as careful study as have the gentlemen who are more directly charged with it. If I understand the Senator from Massachusetts correctly, however, it is to the effect that, as stated by the Senator from New York, as soon as this bill has received the signature of the President the articles mentioned in the second section will be free to enter from all the world.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not say that, Mr. President; neither did the Senator from New York.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator from New York to say, and I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to echo it——

Mr. LODGE. I said in my opinion section 2 would become law without action on the part of Canada, not of the rest of the world.

Mr. ROOT rose.

Mr. BACON. I understood, if the Senator from New York will pardon me a moment, in order that I may not be misunderstood in what I said—the Senator from Massachusetts to be restating what I understood had been previously stated by the Senator from New York, that the moment the President's signature was attached to the bill, without further action by either Canada or this country, the articles enumerated in the second section would immediately be entered free of duty from all parts of the world.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. ROOT. I made no such statement as that.

Mr. BACON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. ROOT. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia? The Senator has combined in his statement two separate and distinct propositions which have been made. The first was the proposition that when this bill is signed the second section goes into effect and makes the articles enumerated therein free, subject to the conditions stated.

The second proposition is the one stated and elaborated by the Senator from Massachusetts—quite an independent proposition—and that is that this, being without consideration, would produce the further effect of making similar articles from the rest of the world free under the favored-nation clause.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from New York agree with that statement?

Mr. ROOT. I do. I think it raises a very serious question under the favored-nation clause.

Mr. BACON. It was with reference to that that I particularly desired to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, and I shall be glad to have the answer either from him or the Senator from New York.

The proposition is predicated upon the assertion that there is nothing that is reciprocal. I suppose the Senator draws the distinction between that which is reciprocal and that which is conditional. Am I correct in that?

The Senator's proposition is that the products of Canada being admitted upon conditions, regardless of whether those conditions are complied with or not, it not being reciprocal, those articles enumerated in the second section will immediately be thrown open to the balance of the world under the favored-nation clause of the several treaties that we have with them, if I understand it correctly. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. ROOT. You are correct.

Mr. BACON. I repeat, I do not wish to place my judgment as of equal weight as that of the learned Senator without a more careful examination.

Mr. ROOT. I assented to the question of the Senator from Georgia; but I do not mean to express a final opinion upon that subject.

I tried to state accurately my position upon it, which is that it raises a very serious question under the favored-nation clause. I do not want to cut myself off from taking the other view if we should get into a controversy with other nations upon the subject. But it would certainly put us in a very embarrassing position with regard to the articles enumerated in the second section if other countries claimed their favored-nation rights.

Mr. BACON. Of course, if the Senator qualifies it in that way, I have no disposition to pursue the discussion at this time, because there will doubtless be a more careful and elaborate discussion of the matter hereafter. But I understood the Senator from New York, and also the Senator from Massachusetts, to have made statements based upon careful study and consideration of the effect of this provision of the treaty; and I, perhaps, am the more excused for having thought that the suggestion was based upon that careful study when I recall the fact that the Senator from New York, when he brought it to the attention of the Senate, did so in a suggestion to the Senator from Texas, prefaced by the statement by him that if the Senator from Texas would give or had given careful study to this particular section, he, in his opinion, would find the conclusion to be such as the Senator from New York suggested.

But if it is not intended that this shall be taken as the final conclusion of the Senator from New York or the Senator from Massachusetts, and that they still hold the matter in abeyance, and we are again to have the benefit of their construction upon a more careful consideration, I am willing to pretermit the discussion.

Mr. ROOT. My suggestion to the Senator from Texas did not relate to most-favored-nation clause at all.

Mr. BACON. It did not——

Mr. ROOT. I suggested that if the Senator from Texas would study the terms of the second section of the bill, he would find that that section would take effect independently of any action by Canada. That is all.

Mr. BACON. I do not think that is true, but I am glad to have the recent statement by the Senator from New York, because it marks the line of difference between his view and that which I myself entertain.

I think the condition precedent is certainly something which contemplates action, and this clause, if I read it correctly, does contain a condition precedent, and that is to the effect that if Canada itself or its Provinces shall have upon its statute books any provision with regard to export duties, this clause does not go into effect, and yet the statement of the learned Senator is to the effect that the minute the President signs the bill—that is his own language, possibly put a little more gracefully than I have endeavored to repeat it—without more on the part of Canada, the law will go into effect.

Now, let me read. After enumerating the various articles:

> Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Now, to say that, with that condition attached, the performance of which must precede the going into effect of this proposed provision of law, that provision of law will go into effect without regard to whether Canada does or has done anything, it seems to me, is untenable. It seems to me it does not go into effect the moment the President signs it. It does not go into effect at all if there are any such laws upon the statute books of Canada or any of the Provinces of Canada. Therefore when the President's signature has been attached, the inquiry will be, Are there such laws upon the statute books of the Dominion of Canada or of any of the Provinces of Canada? If the answer is in the affirmative, then the law is of no effect.

Mr. ROOT. Suppose the answer is in the negative, does not the paper come in free?

Mr. BACON. If it is in the negative——

Mr. ROOT. If the bill is signed to-morrow, and the next day an invoice is presented to the customhouse in Ogdensburg, and free entry is demanded, and there is proof that there is no export duty upon that paper or the material of which it is composed, does it not come in free?

Mr. BACON. But the Senator assumes there is none and will be none when this law is passed. If that were the case, it was not necessary to express the condition in the bill. It was the very fact that either there are now such laws upon the statute books of the Dominion of Canada, or of the Provinces of Canada, or that there was a recognition of the fact that there might be such laws thereafter, that this condition was expressed; and as long as it is expressed, it seems to me, it is illogical to say that this provision of law will go into effect regardless of whether Canada does anything or not.

Mr. ROOT. It is well known that as to a very considerable part of the paper and pulp, or the materials for the manufacture of pulp and paper in Canada, there is no restriction whatever.

Mr. BACON. That may be true.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me just a moment further, although I believe I have the floor in my own right.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I understand the Senator from New York to agree with, although he did not first make it, that the passage of this law would be so in conflict with the provisions in various treaties we have with other nations, generally known as the "favored-nation clause," that it would immediately throw our ports open to the entry of these articles from all nations, I can not agree with the Senator from New York in the differentiation he makes between a reciprocal concession on import duties on the part of Canada, and the condition precedent which we speak of, and which is recited in the bill. Anything which is a consideration in the reciprocal agreement relieves it from the favored-nation clause, and the performance of a condition precedent, which of itself is one of money value, to wit, the taking off of export duties, it seems to me would stand exactly in the same relation to the effect it will have upon the favored-nation clause that a reciprocal promise for the admission of certain articles free of duty would have.

There is no difference between the two in principle. A condition that certain export duties shall not be imposed is just as good as a reason why we should concede the remission of a tariff duty, as would be the promise that a certain other article should be admitted free of duty when exported from this country into that. One is a consideration, so is the other, and either as a consideration would relieve us from the criticism that it would be in conflict with the favored-nation clause.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the distinguished Senator from New York for his construction of the bill upon one phase of it. I have a very great respect, as I think others have, for his legal ability. I want to inquire whether under the bill, without the amendment, wood pulp and the other materials named in section 2 could not come into the United States free of duty provided they originated in a Province of Canada which levied no export duty. Is that the understanding of the Senator? If I have not made my question plain, it is this: There are two views that might be taken of the bill as drawn. One is that no wood pulp can be received in the United States from Canada free of duty until all our wood pulp is admitted into all parts of Canada free of duty. The other view of the bill, without the Root amendment, would be that if wood pulp originated in any Province of Canada and that Province did not levy an export duty, then that wood pulp could come into the United States free, and citizens of the United States could ship their wood pulp into that Province free. Is that the understanding of the bill without the Root amendment?

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President, I can not bring my mind to that view of the effect of this provision of section 2 of the bill or of the corresponding provision of the agreement. It does not seem to me that the terms of the agreement or of the bill furnish a basis for a discrimination between Provinces as such. Nothing is said about Provinces. The distinction drawn is between wood, wood pulp, paper, and so forth, which are subject to export duties or restrictions, and wood, wood pulp, paper, and so forth, not subject to restrictions. The agreement and the bill do not undertake to draw any line of Province or no Province. They make their distinction upon the treatment received in Canada by these particular articles whatever the treatment accorded, whatever the authority for it, or the basis of it may be.

The provision presented to my mind this question, whether, when the agreement says the condition is that such wood pulp and paper shall be free from import duty or restriction, it means the particular article which is presented at the customhouse on the one hand, or the class of article throughout Canada to which the thing presented at the customhouse belongs on the other hand.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Let me proceed.

Mr. CLAPP. But there is the crucial point.

Mr. ROOT. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish my sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. ROOT. If it means the first, then any article coming from any part of Canada, from whatever Province, which is not subject to restriction or made from material that is subject to restriction, will be immediately entitled to come into this country free on the signature of the President to this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. If it means the second, then it would be necessary for anyone who sought entry for any one of these articles to show that that class of articles was free from export duty or restriction in Canada.

Mr. REED. In all Provinces?

Mr. ROOT. In all Provinces. In neither case do I see that the line between Provinces enters. I am not prepared to say which of those views of the meaning of this agreement is the correct view. I am in doubt. I understand that the precedents in the Treasury Department of decisions upon somewhat similar statutes have been in favor of the more narrow construction, in one view a broader construction, applying the term such wood pulp and paper, sent to the particular article that is presented at the customhouse. If the course indicated by those precedents be followed, then, no matter from what Province an invoice of paper or pulp comes, if that identical paper and pulp be free from the limitation of an export duty, it comes in free.

Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota with pleasure.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Minnesota let me finish my inquiry of the Senator from New York?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from New York intend or does he concede that the amendment he offers would change the construction of the main part of the statute, whatever that construction may be?

Mr. ROOT. Not in the least degree. I intended by the amendment only to provide that when anything comes free here it may go free into Canada, so that if the paper maker in Watertown and on the south shore of the St. Lawrence sees paper made in Canada coming into our market free, he may send his paper into the Canadian market free; and it will have no other effect whatever.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. May I ask the Senator, since that is his view, it is the contention is it not of the paper maker in Watertown that he is unable to compete now with the paper maker in Canada because of the extra cost of production? Does the Senator contend that it would do the paper maker of Watertown any good to take off the Canadian duty on his product and let it into Canada to compete with Canada's market when that same paper maker contends at least that the Canadian paper maker can drive him out of business here, because he can make it so much cheaper than the Watertown manufacturer?

Mr. ROOT. I do not know about that, Mr. President. The paper makers in Watertown have not been contending——

Mr. BROWN. The Senator mentioned Watertown, and that is the only reason why I mentioned it.

Mr. ROOT. I mentioned it because it is on the border, and I may say it is a city in my own State, where there are many thousand people dependent upon the manufacture of paper. They think if the manufacturers in Canada are entitled to send their paper to New York to sell free of duty, they are entitled to send their paper to Montreal to sell free of duty, and that was the agreement.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. Theoretically, it is true that the paper makers in America have had the same right to an easy market in Canada that the paper maker in Canada has in America, but it is the contention, is it not, that the paper makers of America are unable to compete with the Canadian paper makers in this market, and therefore they are opposed to removing the American duty on Canadian paper. If that is true, what actual benefit do the paper makers of our country derive from having free access to the Canadian paper market?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I can not base my view of this bill upon the contention that the paper makers of America can not compete with Canadian paper makers, because I am going to vote to take away from them all protection by way of a tariff duty. What I do want is, when we take away all protection from them for the purpose of giving effect to an agreement which gives to them an entry into the Canadian market, however much or however little it may be worth, they shall have what the agreement gives them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator takes his seat——

Mr. ROOT. I will say, Mr. President, that I do not think that this amendment is of the importance which has been ascribed to it in many quarters and perhaps generally. I do not think it is a matter of the first importance, but it is an amendment which provides that our own people shall have one stipulation, valuable or not, that is accorded to them by the Canadian Government in the agreement which has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator from New York resumes his seat I wish to call his attention to the evidence which exists in the agreement itself that the narrow construction which he thinks might possibly be placed on the word "such" is hardly possible under other language in that same agreement.

I understand the Senator from New York to contend that it might be possible if this bill were passed as it is proposed and section 2 remains as it does now, that immediately upon its passage paper might be brought to this country from Canada, and, provided it was made of wood from a Province which imposes an export duty, then because of the narrow construction of the words "such paper" it would be subject to immediate entry into the United States.

It seems to me that that construction of the word "such" in that paragraph is not possible, for the reason that in the paragraph immediately following the same language is used, not applied to the Canadian products but applied to the products of the United States exported into Canada. The provision I refer to is as follows:

Provided also, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

It is manifest from a reading of that provision that it is not possible to apply the narrow construction to the word "such" in the free-list provision, which the Senator from New York has thought possible.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I say two things regarding the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska? The first is that the clause to which he has just referred is omitted from the bill, so that there will be no such weight to the construction of this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. However, I think that as the bill is in support of a reciprocity agreement and in view of the fact that it is to carry out that agreement, the agreement might be looked to for language to interpret this particular legislation.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, if the bill did follow the agreement, but may it not well be inferred from the fact that the bill industriously departs from the terms of the agreement that it intended to do something else than the agreement.

There is a second thing which I wish to say regarding the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska. I do not say the construction which he has stated is not correct. As I have already said, I have been in serious doubt as to which of the two constructions was correct which the agreement meant; but if the construction which makes the words "such paper, pulp," apply to that class of articles be correct, then it makes no difference practically in the immediate future as to whether the amendment is put in or left out, because there would not be any results. If the construction is the true one—that there can be no restriction upon the class of articles—then nothing can come in free either with the amendment or without it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, in reply to the Senator from New York, I want to say that, so far as the export duties levied by the Canadian Provinces are concerned, their treatment in the bill is identical with their treatment in the agreement, and therefore, as far as these paragraphs are concerned, there is no departure from the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New York to what I believe to be a fact, that there is no Province in Canada that has an export duty upon paper. They have an export duty upon pulp wood and pulp, but they have no export duty upon paper. The bill provides that paper under the value of 4 cents per pound can come in free.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] discussed the question as to whether there were any restrictions in section 2 of the proposed bill. There are restrictions in the Provinces as far as pulp wood and pulp are concerned, but not as to paper itself, and therefore paper can come in free as soon as the President signs the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that paper must be made from wood not subject to such restrictions.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. The Senator may have the Canadian bill here. I do not find it in this report. I thought it was here. The Senator from New York calls attention to the fact that the clause which the Senator from Nebraska read is omitted from the bill pending here. I wish to inquire if it has been omitted from the bill before the Parliament at Ottawa.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have already read into the RECORD to-day the provision in the Canadian bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it from the Canadian bill or the document which is before us, from which the Senator has just read?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was the document printed under the authority of the Senate containing a reprint of the Canadian bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the ship of this legislation never encounters any rocks any more dangerous than the one which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has imagined he sees under the water, and very far under it at that, she will sail on very smoothly. This for the simple reason that the entire bill as passed by the American Congress and signed by the American President in its totality will be consideration for the entire bill which will be passed by the Canadian Parliament and become a law there in its totality, and for the further reason that it took not only two parties to make this bargain, but it will take two parties to make this legislation. The trouble which is being complained of is cured by the fact of the existence of the provision desired in the legislation now pending before the Canadian Parliament. That is Canada's side of the bargain.

Mr. President, I shall not go into that much more particularly. There are some things in connection with this matter that I know the public does not understand and that I think probably some of us do not understand.

In Canada the public lands are called Crown lands. There are two different classifications of Crown lands. Some of the Provinces, the old Provinces, which entered into the original union at the time of its formation, own the Crown lands within their borders, and the Dominion of Canada has no more to do with those Crown lands than the Government of the United States has to do with the public lands of Texas, which retained its public lands when it entered into the American Union, when it was not "annexed," as that map says, but when it was "admitted."

Now, then, another classification of Crown lands are the Crown lands owned by the Dominion, which is the general or Federal Government of Canada. These exist in such Provinces as Alberta and Saskatchewan, Provinces which were territories at the time of the formation of the Dominion Union, but which have since been admitted as Provinces, or, as we would say, as States. In those cases the Crown lands are Federal lands.

Now, I do not like to argue about words. I always like to argue about things or else keep my lips closed.

If the Root amendment is adopted, wood pulp and pulp wood and paper, and principally news paper, print paper, for that is the thing which is being considered most, can not enter into the United States free of its present tax until every Province in Canada owning its own public lands shall have removed all restrictions upon exportations which those Provinces now have. In other words, the period of the free importations of print paper into the United States will be either perpetually or indefinitely postponed. That is the whole proposition.

If the Root amendment be not adopted, then, although one Province in Canada or two Provinces may maintain their restrictions under their state-rights doctrine, there recognized by the Dominion, we can still obtain print paper into the United States free from these sources: First, from privately owned timber; secondly, from Crown lands owned by the Dominion in those Provinces which were admitted as States subsequent to the formation of the Canadian Union.

Now, you can make your choice. Those of you who want indefinitely to postpone the period of the entry of print paper into the United States from Canada and wood pulp from Canada into the United States can vote for the Root amendment and you will accomplish your purpose.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. And not only will this postponement be indefinite, but it will probably be perpetual, for these reasons: You will, with the Root amendment, furnish no sort of inducement to the Provinces in Canada desiring to retain the restrictions to remove those restrictions, and not only that, you will furnish the greatest temptation and inducement to the International Paper Trust of the United States to see to it that they never do remove those restrictions.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now. The bill did not come from the House accidentally. The House did not word it as it is worded without due deliberation and thought. It was drawn this way of a set purpose, and, in drawing it, it is to be presumed, at any rate, that the State Department was more or less consulted. If the bill as it passed the House passes the Senate, then this will happen: Print paper out of wood grown upon the Dominion Crown lands and grown upon privately owned lands can come into the United States free, as can also the pulp wood and wood pulp, for the use of our paper manufacturers. This will enable our paper manufacturers to compete with those of Canada, because substantially the only advantage our neighbors have is cheaper raw material, while putting print paper from Canada into the United States on the free list will force them to compete.

Now, those of you who desire indefinitely to continue the present grip of the International Paper Co. upon the paper business of the United States can vote for the Root amendment. Those of you who desire to loosen that grip, who desire to take from the throat of the consumers of paper this great strangling hold, will not vote to put the Root amendment upon the bill.

Now, another thing. A very great deal of importance has been attached to the fact that the Root amendment——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will just pardon me, I think he has misquoted. I wish to call his attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now. I will yield later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I must say in excuse that I am not accustomed to the method of debate in the Senate; I am rather in the habit of trying to finish a thought, and I want to finish it continuously if I can.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator misquoted, and I wanted to correct him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A great deal of importance has been attached to the idea that the Root amendment is in strict accord with the agreement between the two countries. Now, I always like to argue things frankly, for two reasons: First, because it is an honest thing to do; and, secondly, because it is always the wisest thing to do. The President of the United States has made no concealment of the fact that the Root amendment does express the original agreement in so far as it was an agreement at all. The House knew it expressed the agreement, and because the agreement as it was made would have resulted in exactly what I have said, perpetually possibly, indefinitely certainly, continuing the hold of the International Paper Co. upon the paper business of the country, the House changed it that far, knowing that when it changed it, it changed the agreement on the whole still further in favor of Canada, and that therefore Canada would not object.

That was the reason why the bill came here in its present shape. The President of the United States has very clearly expressed it in his speech at Chicago. By the way, I hold no brief to defend the President of the United States, and if I incidentally defend him here and there, it will be because of a difference between me and Republican Senators. When a Republican President has a lucid interval on the question of protectionism, I like to go to his assistance, and when he has a lucid interval you feel like hitting him over the head with a club. So I make that excuse, at any rate, for defending him in this particular, in so far as I shall.

It has been charged that the President made a speech in Chicago and that he did not send the speech to the Houses of Congress as a message. With the exception of Thomas Jefferson, who never made any speeches at all, but who did all his work of molding public sentiment and legislation, outside of his messages, around the dinner table and by letter, there has not been a President of the United States from the beginning who did not make speeches to the country, and make speeches upon political subjects, and make speeches for the purpose of molding public opinion.

The Senator from Texas says—I have forgotten his exact language—Oh, yes; that it was "to put pressure upon the Senate" by arousing public opinion. I would not be undiplomatic enough to say that the Republican President wanted to put pressure upon this august body, but I would say that it would not have been lese majesty if he had.

This body is not so very august that anybody, anywhere from a bootblack to a President of the United States, can not rise up and advise it. All the newspapers are advising it every day. Every time one of you makes a public speech at home and it is printed, you are putting pressure through public opinion, in a certain sense, upon both Houses, but not in any wrong or in any bad sense. There is no blame to be attached to the President of the United States because he thinks that the enactment of certain legislation will be for the public welfare, and, believing it, tries to mold public opinion in favor of its enactment, not only in his messages, but in public speeches and even in private conversation. In so far as that be a pressure upon the Senate, it is a legitimate and a right pressure.

My friends, I learned but two things from the hearings before the Finance Committee. One was that nobody in America can in any line of business compete with anybody anywhere with the aid of Government extended in the form of taxation of his competitors.

The other was that when a man came there to plead for the retention of a tax he was treated with the utmost courtesy, as one of the distinguished citizens of the United States, probably as one of its captains of industry; and although the retention of the tax carried money into his pocket, it was not regarded as a treasonable act on his part to beg for its retention; but if a man came before that committee begging for the tax to be reduced, immediately the exclamation was, "Why, by the reduction of this tax you will be richer," and that was regarded as a treasonable way of getting rich. We have got to about the stage where the great interests control this country so completely that a man who wants to untax the people and frankly admits by their being untaxed he as well as the people will be benefited is regarded as a fellow who has committed a sort of high treason, whereas the man who wants to retain a tax or wants to increase a tax is regarded as an enterprising captain of industry whom no man can treat too well and whom no committee can consider too highly.

Mr. President, in connection with the question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], if Senators will take the trouble to begin on the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth lines of page 15 and to read down to the fourth line on page 16, and if then they will take the trouble to begin on line 15, on page 19, and read through the twenty-third line on the same page, and connect that with the language on page 23, in section 2 of this bill, they will understand what I have said about this bill being in toto a consideration for a Canadian bill in toto truly reciprocal and not anywhere gratuitous, and not subject to any criticism under the "favored-nation" clause of any treaty.

In conclusion, I beg the Senator's pardon for not yielding at the time he asked me, and shall be glad to do so now; I mean the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he understands that any Province in Canada can impose an import duty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; no Province in Canada can impose an import duty.

Mr. CLAPP. Such a duty can be imposed only by the general Canadian Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the Dominion of Canada. If I said "import duty," I meant "export duty."

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I thought.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. These restrictions are in the shape of export duties wherever the Crown lands—or the public lands, as we would call them—are owned by the Provinces.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word further right there, for I forgot to say it at the proper time. If the Root amendment is not adopted, we hold out the inducement to several Provinces of Canada to withhold those restrictions. If we admit, for example, print paper made from wood grown upon Saskatchewan and Alberta lands free into our country, whereas we retain a duty of $3.75—I believe that is the amount, although I may not be accurate—upon the print paper made from wood in New Brunswick, if New Brunswick be one of the Provinces with restrictions, then we hold out an inducement of $5.75 a ton to New Brunswick to remove its restrictions in order to enter our market. The Dominion of Canada can not make her remove them; the Dominion of Canada never agreed to do it. Moreover, if Senators will mark the correspondence as well as the final so-called agreement, they will see that the minds of the two countries never came together upon the question of paper and wood pulp and pulp wood at all. One merely said, "I will try to do this, if you will do that," the first having said prior to that time, "I will do this if you will do that," and the reply was not, "I will," but, "I will use such influence as I have to get it done, and so far as I am a Dominion I will do it." That is as near as they came to a perfect agreement.

Mr. CLAPP. I am in hearty accord with the Senator, let me say, in opposing the Root amendment, because it is one more entanglement of this proposition; but I doubt whether the Senator is correct in his statement that the Root amendment goes to any action of any Province. The Root amendment simply relates not to export duties, which are referred to earlier, but to import duties on the part of Canada.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if the original agreement as it was made had been kept, we would not have admitted any paper that was the product of any Province with restrictions.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true.

Mr. President, I want to say at this time—and I am not going to speak at any length upon the bill—I have heard some speeches made against this bill and have read several others, but I have not heard or read any speech that satisfied me so thoroughly that this bill ought to be defeated as the effort of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to say what this bill meant. I invite the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to this: It is true that as to wood pulp from private-owned mills this proposition applies, and yet so learned a man as the Senator from New York, close as he must be to the source of this bill, was in doubt, as shown by his answer in response to a question, I believe, of the Senator from Missouri, as to what the bill did mean. The distinguished Senator from Mississippi is correct that paper made from Crown-lands timber would come in free.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Paper made from timber on Dominion Crown lands.

Mr. CLAPP. Paper made from timber on Dominion Crown lands or made from lands in private ownership would come in free. Let us clear that question from all ambiguity by striking out the entire proviso with reference to paper. If the duty upon paper is a burden, which it is the duty of Congress to remove, then it is our duty to remove it in such a manner that there shall be no question as to whether or not we have removed it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that particular, I am heartily in accord with the Senator from Minnesota, not only as to Canada, but as to everybody else.

Mr. CLAPP. I am very glad to hear the Senator accede to that. Two years ago—to use a vulgarism, possibly—Congress gave these people a gold brick in the tariff bill. I opposed it then, and I propose to oppose it now. If we are going to put paper, as we did then, at a certain rate, or if, as the Senator from New York says, he is ready to vote to put paper on the free list if Canada will put it on the free list, which is a mere shadow dance, because last year all the paper products of this country that went into Canada only amounted to a sum total of about $300,000, while the Canadian exports to this country amounted, of all those articles, to over $4,000,000, but if we have reached a point where we are ready to do this, then I, for one, shall insist in the consideration of this bill, as I did two years ago, that it is not right to impose a double burden upon the American consumer. I am very glad, indeed, that the Senator from Mississippi has signified a willingness to join in that proposition.

While I am on the floor I want to call attention to the fact that this debate has drifted very far from the fundamentals upon which it started under the auspices of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. His objection to this bill in its present form and to the proposed amendment was that it would give a certain class of legislation—reciprocal legislation—to certain States of this Union while it would not accord the same condition to other States. I admire the Senator's fundamental proposition as a matter of morals and ethics, but it has become somewhat antiquated in the history of tariff legislation in this country.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff act gives the State of Maine one kind of a tariff and the State of Minnesota another. Turning to page 90 of that act under section 27, you will find this provision:

> SEC. 27. That the produce of the forests of the State of Maine upon the St. John River and its tributaries, owned by American citizens, and sawed or hewed in the Province of New Brunswick by American citizens, the same being otherwise unmanufactured in whole or in part, which is now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty, shall continue for two years after the date of the passage of this act and no longer to be so admitted, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time prescribe.

The owner of pine timber in Maine under that provision has the right to float his logs across the river and there have them hewed or sawed, but when the request was made that the same privilege be accorded to the owner of pine timber in the State of Minnesota, it was denied. I do not wonder that the Senator from North Dakota may not have been accustomed to a system of tariff that accorded one privilege to the owner of pine timber in one State and denied it to another; and I simply wanted to remind him that the people of Minnesota had become somewhat accustomed to it, and that the reciprocity bill is not the first bill in the history of tariff legislation that favors one State and withholds the same favors or privileges from the people of another State.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if at the time that bill was considered there was any objection to that provision of the bill or did Minnesota at any time ask the same privilege?

Mr. CLAPP. Minnesota asked the same privilege, and, as in a great many other instances in the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill in the open forum of the Senate, the privilege was accorded to Minnesota, but when the bill came out of that remarkable conference committee of 1909 the privilege as to Minnesota was stricken out and left standing as to Maine.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason I asked the Senator was because I remembered no act on the part of the Senate tending to show partiality between one State and another; and so it was quite a surprise to have my attention called to it to-day by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, it was a surprise to us, but we are getting accustomed to being surprised under this form of legislation. So I wanted to remind the Senator from North Dakota that he, too, must expect to tolerate conditions here and also get somewhat accustomed to this character of legislation.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to rise to debate this question this afternoon. At the proper time—and I understand the bill is now before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment—I propose to offer the following amendment: On page 23, line 19, after the word "duty," where it first occurs, to strike out the comma and insert a period and strike out all the remainder of page 23 and lines 1 and 2, on page 24, down to and including the word "board," in line 3, on page 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, after the word "duty," in line 19, where it first occurs, it is proposed to strike out the comma and insert a period, and to strike out the remainder of page 23 down to and including the word "board," on line 3, of page 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire action upon the proposed amendment at the present time?

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask whether the amendment just sent to the desk by the Senator from Minnesota was offered to the bill or proposed to be offered at some other time?

Mr. CLAPP. I offered it because I understood the bill was being considered as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. In a parliamentary sense, is the amendment pending which was brought forward by the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to be voted upon when it is taken up. It has been reported by the committee, but action thereon has been temporarily deferred.

Mr. CUMMINS. Can other amendments be offered to the bill until that amendment is disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; under the circumstances, as long as the Senate has, by unanimous consent, deferred action upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, I do not want to interfere with the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota; but I wanted to know when the bill comes up again upon what the pending question will be?

Mr. GALLINGER. The question will be on the amendment reported by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will then be in the same condition it is now, unless in the meantime it has progressed in some manner, and the Chair hardly sees how it could progress with a pending amendment undisposed of.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know that two amendments could be pending to the bill proper at the same time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can only be by unanimous consent, but by unanimous consent the amendment reported by the committee has been temporarily laid aside, and the Chair supposes that other amendments can be considered in the meantime.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota offered an amendment and asked that it be printed and lie on the table to be submitted later.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, at this time, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I want to make a statement. Of course, it will be understood by those who have followed the text of the bill that the amendments I have submitted and asked to lie on the table, if it prevails, will simply enlarge the concession, and consequently can in no wise interfere with whatever there may be of the idea of a reciprocal relation in the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It means, does it not, that wood pulp and paper may come in free from all parts of Canada, no matter whether there are restrictions or not?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir; that is what it means.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present Presiding Officer was not in the chair when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] offered his amendment. The Chair understands that he offered his amendment with the request that it be printed and lie upon the table, and not for immediate action.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but, as I understand, it has the parliamentary standing of an amendment offered to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. And takes precedence of the amendment presented by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; not necessarily.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a little difficult for me to understand how there can be two amendments pending at the same time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, as I happened to occupy the chair at the time, I will say that the amendment was offered in the form that amendments are offered every day, as a matter of information to the Senate. It was read, ordered to be printed, and lie on the table, to be offered later on as an amendment upon which action shall be taken. I should judge, however, that it would not necessarily be considered prior to the consideration of the committee amendment, but that it will be taken up for consideration whenever the Senator from Minnesota presents it for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Hampshire has stated it exactly as I understand it, and my inquiry can be very easily answered by a reply to this further question: Suppose we were to take a vote at this moment, is there an amendment pending upon which we could vote; and if so, what amendment is it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending on which a vote could now be taken.

Mr. OVERMAN. When can the vote be taken, Mr. President, on what is known as the Root amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate desires it to be taken. It has been temporarily passed over by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was it not passed over temporarily; that is, for one calendar day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair assumes that means for to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. For to-day only?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so assumes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill is before the Senate, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is being considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. I meant in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next step, naturally, would be to report the bill to the Senate, but the Chair hardly sees how the bill can be reported to the Senate with an amendment temporarily passed over without action as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from New York to say that he could offer his amendment in the Senate just as well as in Committee of the Whole, and that he would so offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not the amendment of the Senator from New York. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has got to be voted on first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been reported by the committee. The Chair presumes it is possible that the bill could be reported to the Senate with this amendment to be acted upon in the Senate, and not be acted upon primarily as in Committee of the Whole; but that can not be done, as the Chair sees the matter, except by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But it could be done.

Mr. SMOOT. There are some 15 proposed amendments that have been offered to the bill. I have them here before me, and it seems to me that they ought to be offered.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that there is no use of his being so eager about this bill. Let us have time, and each Senator will offer such amendments he may have to offer. There is no occasion for the Senator from Utah to borrow trouble about amendments that other Senators have submitted.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not bothering myself about any amendments that anybody else has submitted. All I am troubling myself about is to have the bill considered. If we can pass it, or if it can be defeated—which I would personally like to see—well and good; but it does seem to me that we ought to consider the bill every day the Senate is in session until it is either passed or defeated.

Mr. NELSON. I am surprised to see the Senator so eager now about the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see why the Senator should be surprised. I should like to get away from here. I will frankly say to the Senator that as soon as we can get through with the public business I would like to see Congress adjourn; and I do not see why we can not consider the bill now just as well as at any other time.

Mr. NELSON. I think we had better consider also the woolen schedule before we adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. That can be done, Mr. President, if there are enough Senators who want to consider it at this session.

Mr. NELSON. I think the woolen schedule ought to go with this reciprocity bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senate feels that way, the Senate can have it. There is no question about its power, and it is a matter entirely in the hands of the Senate; but the reciprocity bill is now before the Senate and should be considered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall not now nor at any other time seek to delay a single moment the consideration of this bill, but in so far as I can effect the procedure it must go along in an orderly way. As I understand, the committee, of which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is a member, reported an amendment. It is pending now before the Senate. I have some desire to submit to the Senate certain observations with regard to that amendment. I do not intend, however, to do so as a mere oration at a time when, under the rule or order of the Senate, the amendment can not be considered; and if the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] are willing to have that amendment postponed until some later day, it seems to me that it necessarily follows that they will be instrumental in postponing the consideration of the entire bill. Whenever the amendment proposed by the committee is before the Senate for consideration and for action, then I desire to submit some remarks upon it; but I object to proceeding with other amendments which concern other parts of the bill until this is disposed of, if that be my parliamentary right.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the bill having been laid before the Senate with only one amendment pending, when that amendment is laid aside for the day it carries the bill with it. No other procedure can be had. The committee amendment has been laid aside for this calendar day. It could be taken up, of course, only by revoking that action, which was by unanimous consent. The bill can not be before the Senate for action until that amendment is disposed of. So I think, in the absence of any other amendment, we have in fact laid the bill aside for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. But could not be voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment could not be voted on——

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill could not be voted upon until the amendment was disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not voted on in Committee of the Whole; amendments only. Then the bill is reported to the Senate with the amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the action in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question of the passage of the bill could not be taken up until the disposition of the amendment, and the amendment being laid aside for the day, it seems to me we are at a standstill except as to any other amendment that may now be brought forward.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is a correct statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Always keeping in mind the fact that this is, I think, the first time in my somewhat protracted service in the Senate when conversation was not sufficiently voluminous to fill up the gaps.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am a long way from home. I am longing for the breezes of California. I have been here now about three months. During that time, it seems to me, the Senate has accomplished very little. I am perfectly content to remain here and do my duty so long as I see that the Senate is, in good faith, undertaking to accomplish results. I should not want to see any Senator denied the right to present his views fully upon this important question, or to see those rights abridged in any way. But it does seem to me that the time has come when we should push this business along.

I have heard a number of Senators say here that they are ready to make their speeches at any time, and I have been wondering for several days why they are not making them. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] seems to prefer to make his speeech at a time when something is before the Senate. But this bill and until this morning the amendment, was before the Senate for consideration, or before the Senate sitting as a Committee of the Whole, and there is no reason, it seems to me, why these speeches should not be made. Personally I should be glad to see the work pushed along with a little more expedition than has been the case in the past.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on that point I desire to state to the Senate that while I am advised that a number of Senators desire to speak against this bill, I have no information whatever as to when they will be ready or whether they will ever be ready.

Now, that is the situation for the Senate and the country to consider. If the Senate would agree on a day to vote on the measure, then there could be no objection to Senators taking all the time they wanted to prepare speeches and address the Senate on the measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania why he consented to the postponement of the committee amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. That unanimous consent was given either while I was out of the Chamber or it escaped my attention. I regret that it occurred, although under the circumstances I am not prepared to say that I would have objected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it was largely due—at least that governed my action in the matter—to the fact that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] said that he intended to speak on the bill and would discuss his amendment on Wednesday immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. PENROSE. That influenced the Senate, and it was also supposed, I assume, that other Senators would be willing to discuss other amendments to the bill in question. It was never suspected or imagined that the postponement of one amendment be made an excuse to suspend the whole discussion on the measure for half a week.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I have certain amendments that I expect to propose. I do not want to propose them until after the amendment brought forward by the committee is disposed of. So it is utterly impossible for me to adjust altogether my amendments to the bill until I know what the sense of the Senate is with regard to the wood-pulp and paper amendment. I assumed this morning that we would go forward and debate and finally determine this amendment, and then I assumed that there would be other amendments proposed which would continue the debate.

I have not much sympathy with the general practice of delivering abstract orations upon this or any other bill, and when I offer such amendments as I desire to offer I expect to address the Senate with respect to them, and immediately address the Senate.

But it is too much to expect that we can prepare ourselves against the unforeseen and, as I think, somewhat extraordinary action taken in postponing the pending amendment so that no other amendment could be offered to the bill; at least, we could not foresee that any other amendment could be offered to the bill; and, as far as that is concerned, I think the chairman of the Finance Committee will have to accept the consequences of having been out of the Chamber when that order was asked and entered, and he ought not, as it seems to me, to impute any desire for delay upon the part of those of us who are not ready to accept the bill just as it is.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not desire to inconvenience any Senator, and so far as I have any influence in the progress of this bill I desire to adapt the progress of it to their convenience. But it does seem to be an extraordinary situation that the Senate, which in my 15 years' experience was never known to run out of its flow of oratory, is to-day found to be practically at a standstill in that respect, and the most careful investigation fails to disclose any Senator who with any degree of definiteness or certainty is willing to say that he will be able to proceed on the general bill or upon any phase of it during the present week.

Now, of course, I do not pretend to say that I have seen every Member of the Senate or that there are not Senators ready to go on. I simply state the result of my own investigation.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield. The Senator from Montana first arose.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. I do not believe there is a desire on the part of any Senator here to delay the debate or the vote on this bill. I personally know of several Senators who want to, and feel it their duty, to make some remarks on the bill, and I am sure some of them have been holding off until somebody had explained what this bill meant and what are the reasons to be advanced for its adoption.

Personally I had hoped to delay my remarks until the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Finance Committee, had made his speech in support of the bill, and possibly also the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. How can we go ahead with this debate in the dark? No report has been made upon it. Not a word has been said in its favor. Not a word has yet been said in the Senate in explanation of the bill by any Senator. I think many Senators here who want to discuss it would, for the purposes of being enlightened—and I say this not wholly in a jocular spirit—like to hear some Member of the Senate who favors the bill. The newspapers are filled with reports that two-thirds of the Senate for some reason or other are going to support the bill, and yet not a man has opened his mouth in this Chamber to say that it is a good bill.

I think, in deference to the membership of the Senate, the men here who are supposedly in favor of this bill, who are announced in the papers as going to vote for it, in justice to the Senate and the country, ought to give some reason for the faith that is in them.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rose to say practically what the Senator from Montana has just said. I am ready to proceed at any time, and I am simply waiting for the opportunity to answer, or attempt to answer, some speech made in behalf of the bill. I have not prepared what I intend to say, but if there is a speech to be made in favor of the bill I am ready to proceed as soon as that is concluded.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas what he is going to do if no speeches are made in favor of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Then I shall endeavor to expose the vices of the bill, without having an opportunity to answer, as I think I could answer, any argument that can be made in favor of it. If it is announced that no friend of the measure desires to address the Senate in behalf of it, then the few of us who are opposed to it are ready to proceed, or at least I am. I do not know how many Senators on this side agree with me in opposing the bill, as it has never been my habit to canvass the Senate, but I am frank to say that the fewer they are the more certain I will be to express my opinion upon it. If I could have all the Democrats in accord with me I would be perfectly willing that they should make the argument and I would save myself that labor and that trouble.

Whenever the Senator from Pennsylvania is ready to say to the Senate that the advocates of the measure do not desire to discuss it, then we will proceed to discuss it, and when we have finished we will be ready to vote.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that he may possess his soul in patience; for he has no chance to see the Senate adjourn until it has, in one way or another, disposed of the free-list bill and the woolen schedule, with such other bills as the House under its prerogative may see fit to send us. But I will also say to him and to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that if they will report the free-list bill and the woolen bill as they have reported this, without a recommendation, then we are ready, and I think I may safely speak for all this side, after a fair debate—and that does not mean a long debate—on all three of the measures, to take a vote. I will go even further and say that I will exert my good offices to procure a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on this bill on a given day, coupled with an agreement to vote on the free-list bill and the woolen bill on succeeding days, allowing only a fair interval between them for debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator from Texas will not overlook the bill for publicity of campaign contributions before election.

Mr. BAILEY. I assume that there will be no effort to prevent a vote on that. I am simply addressing myself now to these bills which relate to the tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say to the Senator from Texas that I am as aware as he is that if a majority of the Senate wants to vote on the free-list bill, the Senate will do it. So as to the woolen bill.

As to what the committee will do with the two bills I am not advised, nor can I say what the result of the committee vote will be. But my opinion is, of course, that there will be a majority vote against them.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure of that, Mr. President—just as sure of it as I am that there was a majority against reporting the reciprocity bill. And all I ask is—and I will make a contract with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] here in the open Senate—I think they ought not to be made at all unless they can be made in the open Senate—that if they will agree to vote with us to report those two bills without recommendation, as this bill was reported, then I will agree upon any reasonable day for a vote on this bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether he thinks it would be fair to report the free-list bill without giving such full hearings as the committee very patiently gave to the opponents of the reciprocity bill?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will make the calculation he will discover that if he gives the same hearings on the free-list bill that he did on the reciprocity bill it will be later than the 1st of August before the free-list bill finds it way into the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes, or even later, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to remain here. I do not consider Washington a very desirable summer resort, but having undertaken this work I am not at liberty to consult my personal comfort, and I am ready to stay here through August or until the next session convenes. But the Senator from Utah, as I understand him, is solicitous for an adjournment, and I am showing him the way to it. We will dispose speedily of this bill; and all I want is an agreement with the Republicans on that committee for a report on the other bills.

Mr. SMOOT. I will frankly say that I do not want a vote upon any free-list bill or upon the wool bill until we get a report from the Tariff Board, and when that report is received and submitted to the Senate I am perfectly willing to consider any bill for the revision of the tariff and base that revision upon whatever that report may be.

Mr. BAILEY. I can well understand that the Senator from Utah should distrust his information on the woolen schedule, in view of the fact that he helped to frame that of the present law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that he is prepared to vote on the other schedules of the tariff law when the Tariff Board reports——

Mr. SMOOT. Not vote, Mr. President—to consider.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, I misunderstood the Senator. I thought he said to vote.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That he would then be ready to vote. I want to say I will not be ready to vote for it——

Mr. SMOOT. Vote for or against it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Unless the changes recommended by the Tariff Board appeal to my judgment——

Mr. SMOOT. Nor would I.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As to what ought to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor would I. The information they are gathering ought to be in the possession of the Senate, and I think it is proper for the committee to wait until they receive that information.

Mr. BAILEY. We have made many tariff bills in the history of this country without the aid of a tariff board. We have made some bad and some worse since the war, and I think we could afford to reverse the process, and instead of raising them or leaving them as they were, which has produced so much dissatisfaction, we might try a reduction, and see if that will not produce a different state of public mind.

Mr. SMOOT. We have a number of times tried a reduction, I will tell the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. There has been only one attempt at a real reduction.

Mr. DIXON and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield, and to whom?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Montana, and then I will resume the session with the Senator from Utah.

Mr. DIXON. I heard what the Senator from Utah, a member of the Finance Committee, said about undertaking the revision of the other schedules, and not being willing to go into it until the Tariff Board had made a report. I merely want to inquire whether or not the Tariff Board made a report on Canadian reciprocity.

Mr. SMOOT. The Tariff Board has only made, I was going to say, a partial report——

Mr. DIXON. On Canadian reciprocity?

Mr. SMOOT. On the question of paper, and also some other reports in relation to some other items. But I want to say that if the Canadian reciprocity bill depended upon my vote in any way, shape, or form, it never would be passed.

Mr. DIXON. I want further to ask the Senator from Texas why he limited his inquiries to the woolen schedule and the free-list bill passed by the House?

Mr. BAILEY. Because they are the only bills now in shape for consideration.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that when Canadian reciprocity, or free trade for the farmers of the Northwest especially, has become a law, and when I see the Members and Senators from the great manufacturing States of this country going on record to put practically every article produced in my State on the free list——

Mr. GALLINGER. Not all of them.

Mr. DIXON. Not all of them, I am corrected by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I am proud that some of them are not. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that there are Senators on this side of the Chamber who always counted themselves pretty good protectionists and who believe in protection to all and not to special interests and special communities—whenever the corner stone is pulled out of the protective tariff system by placing the farmers in a free-trade market, so far as what they sell is concerned, and the attempt is made to make them purchase in a highly protected market everything they buy, there are some votes on this side of the Chamber——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Several of them.

Mr. DIXON. Several of them, as a Senator in my rear suggests, men who have been counted pretty good protectionists, will not be greatly adverse to taking up the chemical schedule and the iron and steel schedule and the cotton schedule and every schedule in the list——

Mr. BAILEY. If we can be assured of enough Republican votes to pass it, we will take one of these bills and make an entirely new tariff bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to suggest to the Senators from Montana and Texas that the proper way to compromise this thing is to attach the free-list bill and the wool bill to the Canadian reciprocity bill. Then we can agree on putting the entire measure through.

Mr. DIXON. So far so good. But I want to add the iron and steel schedule and the chemical schedule and the cotton schedule to Canadian reciprocity, and then we will vote.

Mr. BAILEY. This is the most gratifying session of the Senate that I have attended during my 10 years of service, and I can well understand how the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Minnesota feel about this bill. I regard it as an abandonment of the doctrine of both parties. It is neither consistent with the system of protection nor with the system of a revenue tariff.

It exposes the farmer to the competition of his Canadian neighbor, and it repeals the duties on two commodities which raise the greatest revenue, according to the rate, among all the 4,000 subject to a duty. It repeals the 7 per cent duty on lumber, which raises annually a million two hundred thousand dollars. There is not a single item in all the 4,000 subject to a duty with a rate as low as that on lumber which raises as much revenue, and yet we are urged in the name of a Democratic revenue tariff to repeal it.

The next item which raises the most money at the lowest rate is wood pulp. It raises more than $1,100,000, and yet I am commanded in the name of a Democratic revenue tariff to repeal a 10 per cent duty that contributes more than a million dollars annually to the public expenses. Those duties ought at least to stand until the 95 per cent average duties of the woolen schedule have been reduced to a rate approaching them.

Mr. President, these hearings which the committee have held abound in denunciation of the Paper Trust. I saw a gentleman stand there and demand the repeal of the tax on print paper as a punishment of the trust, and yet, sir, he coupled that demand with the further demand that the tax shall be taken off of wood pulp. To feed it free raw material is a new way to punish a trust.

Assuming that there is a Paper Trust, the sum of this transaction will be to reduce the cost of the manufacture of its product about in the same proportion that it will reduce its selling price; for this bill couples free raw material for the Paper Trust with the free paper itself. Indeed, sir, it not only proposes to repeal our tariff duty on the raw material of this Paper Trust, but it is so drawn as to coerce the Canadian Provinces into abrogating their export tax on it; and thus this Paper Trust is to have the benefit not only of a remission of the duties which we now collect, but it is to have also the benefit of the remitted export tax now levied by the Canadian Provinces.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that the same party who was complaining most bitterly of the Paper Trust made a statement that it would make a difference to the one man or set of papers in this country of $600,000, and that the paper would not be sold to the people of the United States for a cent less if they had free print paper or pulp wood; and he himself admitted that his gains last year amounted to nearly $200,000.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, Mr. President, and when finally pressed I think the record will show that the same gentleman admitted that his own newspaper paid a Federal corporation tax on $187,000 net profits last year.

Now, this gentleman, an excellent gentleman, no doubt, but biased by his own self-interest, stood in the presence of the committee and declaimed against the Paper Trust, and at the same moment demanded free raw materials for it. The duty he now pays on his print paper is 10 per cent; the duty that every laborer who works for his paper pays on his woolen clothes now averages 95 per cent; and a Democratic House, under the stress of a revenue necessity, was not able to reduce those duties below 42 per cent. In God's name, Mr. President, when did it come to pass in this country that a man whose net profits total $187,000 shall be heard to complain of a 10 per cent duty, while the laborers who work in his establishment are compelled to pay a tax averaging more than 40 per cent on the clothes they wear? Is this the rule according to which Democrats expect to frame a revenue tariff?

Mr. President, this bill takes the tax off of hay, on which we collect $386,000 annually, and yet it leaves a tax on everything which the farmer must use in making and marketing his hay. Three hundred and eighty-six thousand dollars of revenue is remitted, and yet the farmer is sent into his meadow to cut his free hay with a taxed mower, to rake it with a taxed rake, to stack it with a taxed stacker, to bale it with a taxed baler, and then he must haul it to town in a taxed wagon. And this, sir, notwithstanding the fact that the Government of the United States collects 20 times as much on Canadian hay as it collects on Canadian mowers, rakes, stackers, balers, and wagons all combined. Can we be told that it is Democratic to take the tax off of the hay which the farmer sells and still leave it on the implements which he must buy to make it? It is small wonder, sir, that gentlemen like the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Minnesota rebel against such a discrimination.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has called attention to the revenue which is derived from hay. It is very considerable. But if this so-called reciprocity agreement becomes a law, I can assure the Senator that there will be no revenue coming from hay in the future; and not only that, but the American producer of hay will suffer a loss that somebody will hear from. I have here——

Mr. BAILEY. I hope it will be the Republican Party, whose President negotiated this treaty.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very likely it will be, so far as this bill is concerned; but if the Senator gets his woolen scheme through, putting wool practically on the free list and reducing the manufactures of wool, I think the Democratic Party will share the discomforts.

Mr. BAILEY. We will take our chance on that.

Mr. GALLINGER. You did in 1892 and 1894.

Mr. BAILEY. We are not now proposing to repeat the folly of 1894.

Mr. GALLINGER. And you put your party out of power.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it will not surprise me to see any party which applies its doctrine of tariff taxation unequally and unjustly driven from power.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I join with the Senator in that declaration. What I wanted to call the Senator's attention to was a report which the Senator can find in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, recently printed, from Consul Frank Deedmeyer, at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, on this question, where he says:

There are now available in Prince Edward Island—

That is a little Province of the Dominion of Canada; we do not think it amounts to very much—

There are now available in Prince Edward Island for shipment to the United States, if freed from tariff duties, 2,000,000 bushels of oats, 100,000 bushels of seed oats, and 150,000 tons of hay, and at the average rate of production maintained during the last five years Prince Edward Island will have for export during the year 1911 100,000 tons of hay, 2,000,000 bushels of oats, 100,000 bushels seed oats, and 75,000 bushels of wheat.

So, if this so-called pact goes through, not only will we lose our revenue from the hay which is brought into this country, but the farmers who are producing hay—and we produced last year in the little State of New Hampshire 780,000 tons—will be deprived to a considerable extent of a profit they have a right to expect if tariff duties are, as the Senator suggests they ought to be, equally distributed on all products and on all industries.

Mr. BAILEY. With a diminishing demand for horses in the work and pleasure of our great cities, the demand for the farmers' hay must correspondingly diminish; and with our supply supplemented and augmented by Canadian importations the price must constantly diminish, or we must relatively curtail our production until we reach a point where the increase in our population is so great that the demand for meat will neutralize this decreased consumption of hay.

Mr. President, I can understand how a man can be a protectionist; and gentlemen who think that they can answer, without effort, the arguments of Alexander Hamilton and Henry Clay are more confident of their capacity than I am of mine. I have more than once in my life found it difficult to frame in my mind an answer altogether satisfactory to some of the arguments which the advocates of protection have advanced; but after considering it up and down until I worked it out, I have no doubt that the best argument lies with those of us who oppose the system of protection. I go so far as to say that if all industries could be permitted to produce on a free-trade basis of cost they could then afford to sell on a free-trade basis of price. There would, of course, be some exceptions. There are some unimportant industries which, in my judgment, would perish, but the capital and labor now employed in them could be more profitably employed in other enterprises just as useful, and the aggregate wealth produced by our people would, in the end, be greater than that produced under this system of protection. But while I believe that, and I would not fear to vote that conviction into a law, I am satisfied that there is no useful industry in this land that can produce upon a protection basis of cost and then market its products upon a free-trade basis of price. If the American Congress subjects any industry to the competition of the world when it comes to sell, and yet compels it to make its purchases at a price enhanced by a tariff, that industry can not survive.

Wise and just as our doctrine of a revenue tariff is, I do not believe it possible to apply it to some industries and free trade to others without working an injustice and a discrimination that must finally culminate in disaster. Under the enormous scale of Federal expenditures now, a tariff for revenue only must of necessity be higher than the fathers of protection advocated in the early days of this Republic, and a large number of men who have heretofore favored protection have come to believe that tariff for revenue affords all the protection that any industry requires; and in a contest between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff I have no shadow of doubt, sir, that a safe majority of the voters of this Republic would support our doctrine.

But, Mr. President, I would fear the result if we allow our adversaries to shift the issue and invoke the popular judgment upon the question of free trade as against protection; and especially would I fear the result if we obscure and complicate the question by advocating a tariff policy which does not operate equally and fairly upon all classes, all sections, and all industries. They shall not, if I can prevent it, excuse the injustice of their policy by assailing the inequality of ours. If we are foolish enough to apply one rule to the American farm and another rule to the American factory, then we will lose our advantage in the argument, and with it we will lose the favor of intelligent and justice-loving men.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to say that the argument of the Senator from Texas, to my mind, is unanswerable. But, at the same time, has not the party of tariff for revenue only done exactly that thing in its vote in the House, by nineteen-twentieths of the vote—removing every vestige of duty on everything the farmer raises? Under this so-called Canadian reciprocity agreement, is not the other side of the Chamber at this time prepared, with the exception of four or five Democratic Senators, to commit the same heresy?

Mr. BAILEY. Canadian reciprocity, Mr. President, is not a party question.

Mr. DIXON. Yes; I admit it is not a party question.

Mr. BAILEY. A Republican President negotiated it.

Mr. DIXON. The Democratic Party is supporting it. Is not that true?

Mr. BAILEY. That, I regret to say, is true; and I think it is a mistake, but all men make mistakes. Our virtue is that we only make an occasional mistake.

Mr. DIXON. But it is an awful one when you do make it.

Mr. BAILEY. Generally the magnitude of a mistake is in proportion to the infrequency of it.

This can not be made a party question unless you are ready to say that your President has come over to our party, because he inaugurated this agreement with Canada. If there is any party advantage in it, your party will obtain it, for I assume that the President will be your next nominee. I understand that he has been composing Republican differences, and you have now about reached the point where the old ticket of Taft and Sherman will be renominated. If that happens, then what advantage can the Democrats hope to derive from this legislation? The assistant never derived any advantage as against the principal. Therefore if this is a wise measure the Republican President who inaugurated it will reap the benefit of it. Then let us agree that if it is not a wise measure the Republican President and his party ought to suffer the odium and the injury of it, instead of trying to shift the responsibility of it to the Democratic Party. That seems fair, even so fair that the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] nods his assent to the proposition. I am content that President Taft shall have all the advantage of it because he inaugurated it. I only insist that if it does not bring good results, and it will not, he shall suffer the disadvantage.

If the price of wheat in the United States falls next year, it will be attributed to this treaty, for this treaty is going to pass, unless some more sturdy threats like that of the Senator from Montana, seconded by several other Senators on that side, shall deter the Republican majority and the Republican administration. If this treaty passes and wheat falls 10 cents a bushel, then all we will need to do is to nominate some man for the Presidency who can read and write [laughter], and we will carry those Northwestern States, for no matter if other causes operate, the people there will simply witness the result and they will hold your party responsible for it. If the price of wheat does not fall, then you will use that circumstance as a refutation of the Democratic claim that a reduction in the tariff on any article will reduce the price of that article. You will ask the farmer, Did we not take the tariff off of wheat, and is not wheat as high as before? Many of the people will not stop to take into consideration that there are many other causes which enter into the question of price besides the tariff, and they will judge by the result which is plainly before their eyes.

My own opinion is, Mr. President, that the effect of this treaty will be to enhance the price of certain articles in Canada and to reduce the price of those same articles in the United States. Under the treaty of 1854 it is probably true that the whole effect was expressed in a rise of Canadian prices. There is a report extant which shows that almost immediately after the enactment of that treaty the price of wheat rose in Canada to a level with the price of wheat in the United States. But it must be remembered, sir, that the Canadian surplus then was insignificant as compared with that of to-day. Therefore it could well have happened that the price of a small Canadian surplus, with the barrier obstructing its flow into the United States removed, would immediately rise to a level with American prices. But the Canadian surplus is now a larger per cent of the crop than ours; indeed, sir, it was larger last year, bushel for bushel, and it is therefore inevitable that this bill will produce an effect upon the price of wheat in both countries, raising it in Canada and lowering it in the United States, until an equilibrium is established; and whatever the Canadian farmer gains the American farmer will lose. Let us remember that out of the proceeds of their wheat our farmers must purchase all other commodities, and let us compensate them by a reduction in the price of those other commodities. In that way we can do them justice. In no other way is it possible; and if the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] will give us five Republican votes——

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to inquire——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. I want to state my proposition first, but if you will accept it before I state it, all right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will offer his free-list bill as an amendment to this bill, and give us a chance to deal with all sections fairly in settling this question——

Mr. BAILEY. I intend to offer the free-list bill as an amendment to this bill, but not exactly as it passed the House. I am going to eliminate—as I did when I offered it in committee—all agricultural products. It did not seem to me much of a compensation to the farmer for the loss which the Canadian treaty will inflict upon him to put him in competition with the balance of the world.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Democratic Senators support that as an amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. I can not speak for all Democratic Senators; but I will tell you what I will do. I will obligate myself to get enough Democratic votes to adopt that amendment if you will obligate yourself to give us enough votes to pass the woolen bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield, and to whom?

Mr. BAILEY. To the Senator from Montana first.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say to the Senator from Texas, with a great deal of admiration for his logic, which, as I said, is almost unanswerable, here is Canadian reciprocity that puts nearly every product of the farm on the free list. Then you are going to follow it up by a so-called free-list bill. The trouble with that is that by the one reported in the House you place some of the farmers' additional products in the free-list bill.

Mr. BAILEY. We will eliminate that provision——

Mr. DIXON. And you crucify the farmer still further. Then when it comes to the House wool bill, reported in a Democratic House, it will bankrupt 500,000 sheepmen west of the Missouri River. With all these blessings falling on the farmer in one year I do not know what is going to become of him.

Mr. BAILEY. We will save him, if you will help us. I shall move to reduce the average duty on woolen goods to 30 per cent and raise the duty on wool to 30 per cent.

Mr. DIXON. It will approach me with a great deal of diplomacy when you do that.

Mr. BAILEY. That will compel the woolen manufacturer to pay the same tax to the Government when he imports his wool that the American laborer and farmer must pay on their woolen goods.

Mr. DIXON. I can not see why the Democratic woolen bill reported in the House gives to the sheep grower 20 per cent and when it comes to the manufacturer gives him 45 per cent.

Mr. BAILEY. It simply continues a Republican inequality.

Mr. DIXON. But while you had the power and the votes to do it, why did you not correct it? Still you protect the manufacturer by double the duty that the sheep grower gets.

Mr. BAILEY. I have just stated my purpose to obviate that criticism.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. While the House cut the duty on wool less than half, it cut the average duty on woolen goods more than half.

Mr. BAILEY. The House reduced the duty on woolen goods at the rate of about 53 per cent and it reduced the duty on wool at the rate of about 55 per cent.

Mr. DIXON. That is in percentages, of course. As a matter of fact, the woolgrower will get only 50 per cent.

Mr. BAILEY. You know how that happened. While the Republican Party pretended to offer the manufacturer and the woolgrower equal protection, it concealed under specific and compound duties a gross favorism to the manufacturer.

Mr. DIXON. There is no doubt about that. I want to say further to the Senator from Texas that if the Democratic side of this Chamber will agree to submit a free-list bill as an amendment to the reciprocity bill now pending and enlarge it a whole lot, and will offer it in good faith here in this Chamber, I think it will have enough votes on this side of the Chamber to write it into the bill.

Mr. REED. But will the Senator support it if it is added on, and will the others he speaks of support the bill when thus amended?

Mr. DIXON. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator from Missouri. The free-list bill reported is just as much an abortion as the Canadian reciprocity bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Not as reported. It has not been reported.

Mr. DIXON. I am a protectionist. I have never had any apology to make to my own conscience or to my constituents. I would not want to be guilty of precipitating the crime. I will say to the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Missouri, if Canadian reciprocity becomes a law, you can not make the free list too wide or too long to suit a whole lot of Republican Senators who have been in their own mind pretty good protectionists.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that almost reconciles me to reciprocity. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED and Mr. CRAWFORD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom, if any one, does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri, and will then yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] who just took his seat a very plain and simple question. I did not get an answer that seemed to me either plain or direct. The Senator said that he could get enough votes to amend the reciprocity bill and add a free list larger than that of the other House, and write it into the law, but he subsequently changed that phrase to "write it into the bill." I want to know if the Senator means to say that he can get enough votes from the Republican side of the Chamber to amend the reciprocity bill and add a free list larger than that of the House, and then command those same votes to pass the bill as amended?

Mr. DIXON. I will answer the Senator from Missouri by saying that I am not speaking for my Republican colleagues; I carry none of their votes in my pocket or under my control; but here is the cruel and unjust situation of the Senator from Missouri, judging generally by his remarks. He is prepared to announce that he is going to support Canadian reciprocity, which removes practically every vestige of protection so far as the farmer is concerned, and yet at the same time he refuses, according to his practically preannounced plan, to support the free-list bill as an amendment to the Canadian reciprocity bill. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri this question: Will he support the free-list bill as an amendment to the bill now pending and give the farmer, from the Senator's standpoint, a square deal?

Mr. REED. I will support the free-list bill as an amendment to the proposition now pending the very moment you will give us enough votes from that side to pass the bill as thus amended.

Mr. DIXON. Oh!

Mr. REED. Of the Chamber to pass the reciprocity bill as amended by the free-list bill; but——

Mr. DIXON. In other words, you place your conscience in the keeping of the Republican side of the Chamber.

Mr. REED. But I will not join a band of legislative assassins who propose to kill the bill by amendment.

Mr. DIXON. No; but you do propose to place your political morals in the keeping of the Republican side of the Chamber by striking down the farmers' protection and at the same time refusing to extend any aid from your standpoint to the free-list bill.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Montana is mistaken. I propose to vote for reciprocity, and I propose, and the Democrats propose, unless we are prevented by the majority, to then give to the Senator who is on his feet, and to all other Senators, the chance to show whether or not they are in good faith when they claim they want to take care of the farmers by giving them a farmer's free-list bill to vote for. When that question comes up, as it will come up, I predict, if we have to sit here all summer, gentlemen who now claim to love the farmer so much will have an opportunity to demonstrate their affection.

Mr. DIXON. But the program of the Senator from Missouri will amount to just this in practical politics: By your vote, under the guise of Canadian reciprocity, you are going to take off whatever protection the farmer now has, the Senator from Missouri well knowing that, as certain as the sun rises east of the Capitol to-morrow morning, when that is done your free-list bill is deader than Hector and will never see the daylight.

Mr. REED. I do not agree to that proposition; but so that my own position may be properly understood, I say now, as I have always said, that, taken in the main, the protective tariff upon the farmers' products is a mere subterfuge and a fraud. I am willing to vote for reciprocity because I do not believe it will injure the farmer, and because I believe it will benefit the country in general.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Missouri answer me how it can benefit any class unless it does so at the expense of the farmer?

Mr. REED. Answering the Senator from Texas—and I do not desire to get into a debate with him on this question at this time—I will say I believe that an extension of trade and of commerce between this country and any other country that is inhabited by the same kind of people that we are, which has the same kind of soil, which has substantially the same kind of climate, except not so advantageous, which was made by the same God at the same time, and is divided from us only by the imaginary line on a map, will result in benefit to all the people of the United States.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota, and then I will yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, for the purpose of lending what little encouragement I may to the prospects here for some cooperation, I want to say to the Senator from Texas, speaking only for myself, but I believe in a large measure speaking for many people in the Northwest, that when we find Senators representing the great States of Pennsylvania and New York and Connecticut and Massachusetts and Maine, sections of the country that owe more to the protective tariff than any other portions of these United States, advocating a measure here which proposes to put upon the free list every article that is produced in the States in the Middle West, we want one killing while we are at it.

Mr. BAILEY. We will help you officiate.

Mr. DIXON. In other words——

Mr. CRAWFORD. And, if the Senator will permit me, speaking for myself, I will say very frankly that I want to deal with this matter in its entirety rather than have it come here in a half dozen different forms.

Mr. DIXON. In other words——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just a moment. If the Senator will prepare an amendment reducing the duties on manufactured articles, particularly articles that are largely used by the country people, and putting on the free list articles commonly known as agricultural implements, so that I can see in his amendment some compensation for what we are asked to give up here in the passage of this bill, I will take delight in going on record in the presence of these Senators from these highly protected manufacturing sections of our country in voting for it and doing what I can to see it pass, because it is a foregone conclusion that unless we can get that we have got to take this. With a great administration backing it, with nine-tenths of the Members on the other side of the Chamber standing for it, and with the Representatives of highly protected manufacturing districts on this side of the Chamber standing for it, we have got to take it; and if we must take it or an amended bill, with your reduction of woolens and cottons and free agricultural implements attached to it, you can have my support.

Mr. DIXON. In other words, the Senator from South Dakota——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from South Dakota means that he does not think it a square deal to have us participate here in a cannibalistic feast—one section of the country eating up the other at the same time; in other words, the Senator from South Dakota, I think, means—at least some other people do—that when Pennsylvania and Mississippi and Massachusetts strike hands on a political economy propaganda some other portions of the country are going to start out on their own hook, so far as political economy is concerned, and we might as well understand it from the beginning of this debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reference to Massachusetts and Mississippi——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi wanted to make one remark in defense and excuse simply for himself. He does not now, in view of that last remark, feel aggressive at all. He has a broken and contrite heart, although he has not the full repentance. I do confess that I do feel badly for Mississippi when I find her temporarily in that sort of company, even when we are all going to the right place. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to consider for an instant, if the Senator from Texas will permit me——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Michigan wait a moment until I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma, who wants to interrogate the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has answered, so far as he is concerned, the question which I desired to propound to the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], whether, if the reciprocity agreement passes the Senate as it now stands and becomes a law, the Senator from Montana would then vote for a free-list bill, or would he insist that it be attached to this agreement? I think, if the Senator from Texas will keep the doors of the church open for a few moments longer, we shall have enough converts to do as we please concerning this legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, in the hope that the Senator from Michigan will join us, I yield to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to advert for a moment to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that this is a good thing to do; that this vast territory, peopled by kindred folk and along our border, should be extended the unusual privilege of membership in the American Union as a State, and at the same time have the protection of one of the greatest powers in the world—a rival of ours in our industrial and commercial welfare. I ask if it is fair or just to handicap the American farmer, to tax him for the schools, to tax him a hundred million dollars for the Army, one hundred and forty millions for the Navy, and one hundred and fifty-five millions for pensions annually, none of which are to be borne by the Canadians, who are placed upon an equality with him upon this market, while one of the greatest naval powers of the world stands perpetual guard over Canada's welfare in her relations with the other countries of the earth, without a burden to bear? Yet you propose to ingraft her into the Union with all the privileges of statehood, and to allow her to maintain her attachment of kinship and relationship with the great power across the sea. I denounce that as an unfair deal; I protest against it in the name of equality and justice to the men who have made this country independent of European control; I denounce it in the name of the men who have carried our flag upon every field of battle, who have brought honor to our arms, and dignity to our citizenship. It is unworthy of any Senator, North or South, to admit into the Union aliens with no obligations to our country at all, who cross over our border at daybreak and leave it as the sun goes down, without a single duty to our country or our flag, and to place them upon an equality with the everyday citizen of this Republic who has all these burdens to bear.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think we could overcome all those objections by annexing Canada, and would it not be better to annex those three Provinces shown on the map on the wall? They would form a good addition to North Dakota and Minnesota, and even to Michigan.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to inquire about their habits and their politics before I consented to that.

Mr. NELSON. Michigan has an island in Lake Superior not far from Port Arthur, and that place would be very near if you could annex it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the suggestion of annexation is most interesting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If we had no one to deal with but Canada, if Canada stood on her own bottom, if she were unattached to any European State, if she thought as we think and lived as we live, there would be little trouble in a commercial union with a great country like that upon our border; but it is idle to talk of annexation or commercial union with that country so long as England keeps her control over Canada. Her control is as active and strong and powerful and potential today as it ever was. Only day before yesterday the brilliant premier of Canada said in the presence of other distinguished statesmen of the British Empire around a coronation table, where they met for conference, that there would be nothing done inimical to England and her relations to the Dominion, and, in my humble judgment, nothing of that kind is being done by this treaty. It is a straight, square, unadulterated gift of the American market to the producers of the soil of Canada without a compensating fixture to our own people.

Mr. President, the suggestion of reciprocity with Canada has been made over and over again to this Government, but no great American statesman in 50 years has been willing to risk his reputation on a proposition like this. For over 50 years Canada has been knocking at our door with this identical proposition. We put it upon the statute books in 1854, and it remained for the immortal Lincoln among the first acts of his administration to strike it down, because of its unfairness to our countrymen. They approached President Grant with dulcet tones and tried to get him into such an arrangement, but he tore it into tatters. They then went to President Harrison and to his Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, without effect. They tried to raise it in connection with the Alaska Boundary Commission; they tried to get in on us every year. It is the voluntary proposition of Canada. We have never been obliged to seek this privilege from the people of Canada. They have knocked at our doors, but they have never been heard, and the wisest statesmanship that has governed this Republic in 50 years has been deaf to the pleadings of the Canadian farmer who, with his 54 per cent of surplus agricultural products, has always sought this market as the best place in the world in which to sell what he raises upon his farm.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Michigan rose to ask a question. It is the longest question I have ever heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is no more puzzling than questions the Senator has considered again and again, if he has adjusted himself to the acrobatic performances of his own party in Missouri and throughout the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I do not know about acrobatic performances; but I do know that the Democratic Party on this proposition is standing on substantially the ground it has stood upon for many years, and I do know——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Pardon me just a moment. I do know that the party of the Senator is to-day torn into as many different elements and factions as there are Members on the other side.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And we have been able to beat the Senator's party, even in factions.

Mr. REED. Yes. I expected to see gentlemen on the other side before this debate was ended wrap themselves in the folds of the American flag and shout loudly of patriotism. I never yet saw a Republican driven by the shafts of logic to the point of despair but he would grab the American flag and wrap it about his body, and say, "Look at that; I own it."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; that is our privilege——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator must not interrupt without first addressing the Chair and getting the consent of the Senator having the floor. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. If he had a question I would, but he has a speech.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and I am going to utter it, but not in the Senator's time.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks about the American farmer paying school taxes. Does not the Canadian farmer who competes with him pay school taxes? The Senator speaks about the American farmer paying taxes to support the American Government. Does not the Canadian farmer who competes with him bear the burden of taxes? The question is not under what flag these people live; the question to be determined is, What will be the result of trading with them? It will make but little difference to the man who eats a loaf of bread in this country whether the wheat was raised under the flag of England or of Canada or under our own flag. So far as that bread is concerned, it is with the consumer a question of nutrition and price, not the latitude or longitude where the wheat was raised.

Mr. BAILEY. But this bill does not put bread on the free list.

Mr. REED. I understand that. I am not standing for this bill as a perfect measure. I think no Democrat stands for it as a perfect measure. The Senator from Texas and myself differ about the feasibility of this measure, but I want to call attention to this one fact, which seems to be constantly disturbing gentlemen on the other side. They act upon the principle that when A trades with B one or the other of those men is injured, and that when we trade with a citizen of a foreign country we are necessarily the losers by that trade. The fact is, no two men ever trade in the world who do not each expect to gain a benefit; the fact is, that all business and all trade rests upon this great truth, that 99 per cent of the trades of the country results in mutual benefit. No American citizen would buy a Canadian product unless he gained by it, and no Canadian citizen would buy an American product unless he gained by it. If the conditions are such that interchange takes place, it follows that that is because interchange is beneficial, and it is a mere begging of the question—I will not use a harsher term—for a Senator to rise in discussing a great commercial proposition, a great trade proposition, and appeal to the prejudice that may exist against other countries.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Missouri that trade is beneficial, but my desire is to enlarge our trade in the most profitable direction. The Democratic platform of 1892 specifically denounced reciprocity with agricultural countries and recommended trade agreements with the 300,000,000 people of Europe who stand ready to take the surplus of our farm products. That was Democratic reciprocity then and now. Remembering that upon the whole Continent of Europe we hardly sell the beef product of a single ranch, I would go there for a reciprocal trade agreement. I would seek commercial arrangements, if I sought them at all, with countries which are able to pay for and which need to buy the surplus of our farms and pastures, and I would not seek an arrangement with a nation at our door which produces a surplus of the very commodities which our farmers and graziers need to sell.

Sir, I believe in good fellowship with neighbors, and I would treat our brothers on the north as well, and, as would be our duty, being older and stronger, even somewhat better than they treat us; but in commerce my closest neighbor is my best customer, and I would concede to those who buy most of what I need to sell, if I made concessions to any.

Reciprocity has a curious history. Some Democrats now call it a step in the right direction, and yet Democrats have generally refused to take that step. Every Democratic Senator voted against the provision of the McKinley bill which authorized the negotiation of trade agreements. There is in the archives of the House of Representatives—and I can mention it, as I do not refer to the present House and none of the honorable gentlemen who signed that report are now Members of that body—a minority report denouncing reciprocity of this kind prepared by one of the ablest and most consistent Democrats who ever honored that body with his services, the Hon. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia; and in our campaign book of 1902 appears a more terrific denunciation of reciprocity in general than I have ever spoken or written.

The Republican Party, on the other hand, has always called it the handmaiden of protection; but I think the author of that expression would hardly recognize the "maiden" that the Republican Party now has by the hand. The advocates of the reciprocity, which was to be a handmaiden of protection, believed, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] this afternoon declared his belief to be, that these arrangements ought to be made as to noncompeting articles.

Not only has reciprocity a curious history, but this particular example of it has met a curious reception in both the House and the Senate. This bill comes here with the earnest approval of the President, and yet the most enthusiastic friend of the administration, the most partisan Republican on this floor, will not say that it is what it ought to be. Democrats support it under a belief that it may lead to a subversion of the protective tariff system; and if I thought that it would effect that result, I would feel less hostile toward it. I do not like the philosophy which commands us to do harm in order that good may come out of it, because I believe that God so organized this universe that no good ever comes out of evil, and no evil ever comes out of good. It may be, sir, that in our blind and insufficient way it will so appear to us, and tempt us to do some small wrong in the hope that a great good will eventuate, but looking at it beyond the day or the week or the years, and down the long flight of the centuries, I am confident that we can never produce a good by doing a wrong. If, however, I could bring myself to believe that our support of this measure would divide the Republican Party and would destroy the system of protection, I would think that the American farmer could well afford to pay the price which it exacts of him.

If the Republican Party should enact this measure into a law without the aid of Democrats it would destroy that party, because whenever it confesses, either in words or by deeds, that protection can not be equally and impartially applied to all sections, to all industries, and to all classes, the country will utterly and overwhelmingly reject it. Nor do I forget that when we declare that our doctrine of a tariff for revenue calls for exceptions in favor of some classes and exceptions against other classes the country will repudiate it.

Mr. President, the only doctrine in this world which can have the sanction of the blessed truth, the only doctrine in this world which men may safely proclaim, is a doctrine which can be equally and impartially applied at all times and in all places, to all men and to all sections, to all industries and to all classes. A doctrine that can not be so applied has in it some inherent vice.

If any Republican Senator is willing to state that this bill fairly and equally applies his doctrine, I will read an overwhelming refutation of his statement in almost every provision of it. Is there one of you willing to say that? [After a pause.] Has it come to pass, Mr. President, that a compact negotiated by a Republican President can find no single Senator of his party to say that it is a fearless and equal application of his party's doctrine?

I again challenge any one of you to say that this bill squares with your professions. There is the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who sat by the side of the President in the Cabinet of a former administration, and yet, bound by the ties of personal friendship and of political fellowship, he will not say that this impartially and fearlessly and equally applies the Republican doctrine of protection.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], one of the stoutest defenders of the doctrine of protection, has already denounced it in more eloquent and more savage language than I can command.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and the sturdiest of them all, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], whose Republicanism has withstood the assaults of insurgency on the one side and of stalwartism on the other side, and who stands like a rock between the two, all denounce this bill. Who is there, Senators, on that side of the Chamber who will rise in his place and say that it is a fair and equal application of your doctrine. [After a pause.] And they are as silent as the grave. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator can get some of us to say that we think it is not a fair and equal distribution.

Mr. BAILEY. They all think that; but they are not candid enough, like the Senator from New Hampshire, to say so.

Mr. President, the most contemptible injustice ever proposed in the American Congress can be found in this bill. Do you know what it is? It is the provision which admits fresh vegetables, specifically naming some of them, free of duty in their natural state. If you were to peel a peach you could not bring it in without paying a tax on it, but as long as you bring it in as you plucked it from the orchard, to the rich and prosperous city folks, it will be free of all tax. If the grain from the farm, the cattle from the pasture, the fruits from the orchard, and the vegetables from the garden are to be relieved from taxation, let us not stop there. Let us provide a free list for the farmer as well as against him.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from Texas brings a thought to my mind which I want to express in just a word, and that is when the Senator is preparing his amendment I hope he will remember that hides are on the free list, and that he will place boots and shoes on the free list.

We want to show our appreciation for the kind attitude of these protectionists in the East who are now so savage in their attempt to place on the free list everything that is produced on the farm.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from South Dakota need have no fear. Shoes will join hides on the free list, and I warn these Senators who come from manufacturing States that in good time the finished product will join every other raw material on the free list. The manufacturer has no greater moral or political right to be exempted from his fair share of taxation than the millions who toil from the day's beginning to the day's end for a bare support. The manufacturers, sir, are rich and prosperous. They can better afford to pay their taxes than the working men and women of this Republic, and they may as well make up their minds to take the same measure of justice which they commend to other people. If they pay no tax on what they buy, they shall collect no tax on what they sell. If the Treasury of this Government will permit the remission of any tax, let us remit the tax on poverty and toil. Let us remit the tax on the shoes that women and children wear rather than the tax on the hides out of which those shoes are made. Let us remit the tax on the common blanket with which the laborer must keep himself warm in the winter time. Let us repeal all of those, sir, before we enter upon the policy of remitting the taxes of the over-rich manufacturers of this land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Texas think it makes much difference at which end of the line we begin on, so we can begin and demoralize the enemy.

Mr. BAILEY. It makes a vast difference. At one end is the burden bearer, who for a century has staggered under the mighty load of this protective tariff; at the other end is the rich manufacturer, who has reaped its golden harvest; and if we must begin at only one end—I would cut both ends, share and share alike—but if we can not do this, let us begin where the relief is needed most, and subject those who have so long enjoyed these special favors to our first revision. If we can not free the product of the farm and factory, or if we can not reduce the tax on both at the same time and in the same proportion, then I shall insist upon repealing or reducing the duty on the product of the factory first.

Since a time whereof the memory of no living man runs to the contrary Democratic leaders have asserted and reasserted that our farmers have borne the burden of this protective tariff while our manufacturers have enjoyed its benefits. And shall we now stultify ourselves and impeach our good faith by proposing that the manufacturer shall continue to enjoy the profits while the farmer continues to suffer the losses of the system? I will not, sir, undertake to speak for others; but, speaking for myself, I do not hesitate to declare that I will never consent to any adjustment of tariff taxes which is calculated to augment the wealth of our manufacturers by subtracting from the wealth of our farmers. The farmer's struggle is hard enough at best, and, except the most successful of them, they have not been more than able to discharge their debts and give their children a common-school education. How different, sir, has it been with our manufacturers? They have prospered beyond the dreams of avarice. The wildest extravagance has not been able to dissipate their enormous profits and they have accumulated fortunes which the human imagination can scarcely comprehend. Mr. President, nothing could lead us further from the path of justice, which is the only path of safety, than to follow this suggestion that if we can not repeal the tax which we most desire to repeal, then we must repeal any tax which we can repeal. Such a course might culminate, and would be apt to culminate, in removing all taxes from one portion of our people while leaving onerous taxes on another portion of our people.

There are three aspects in which every tariff duty must be considered. The first is the revenue it will yield to the Public Treasury; the second is the effect upon the consumer; and the third is the effect upon the producer. No Democrat would consent to levy a tax of any kind except for the purpose of collecting money to support the Government; and while some of us think that it would be better to support the Government by a direct ad valorem tax on all property, we all know that under our Constitution, as it now stands, such a tax is not practicable and that we must collect a large sum of money each year through the customhouses. We also know that, as a general rule, the exceptions to which are rare, a tariff duty, though levied purely for the purpose of raising revenue, is a burden to the people who buy and consume the article on which it is levied and a benefit to those who produce and sell that article, and no wise man or just man can ignore that consequence. It is therefore the manifest duty of a Democrat when he comes to levy tariff taxes to adjust them so that the burdens and the benefits will be distributed as equally as possible. We must do that, not because we believe in protecting anybody, but because we believe, first, that the burden of taxation shall rest in fair proportion upon all people; and, second, that an unavoidable incident of taxation shall extend to all classes as nearly as possible without discrimination. This simple rule of justice, sir, is sometimes stigmatized by men who do not think to the bottom of this question, as a plea for protection; but it is far from that, and it is neither more nor less than the assertion of that ancient and fundamental Democratic principle that all men shall have equal rights and that no man shall have a special privilege.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to interrupt the Senator from Texas with a question or two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator speaks of the heavy burdens which have been laid upon the farmers for the benefit of the manufacturers. Is he not aware of the fact that the great strength of the Republican Party in the past years has been due to the fact that it has been able to hoodwink the farmers, of the West particularly, into the belief that they were getting a benefit from this protective system?

Mr. BAILEY. That is true, and I regret it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, if that be true, I ask the Senator these two questions: If the result of this reciprocity bill, when passed, shall be to take from the farmer some measure of protection, as the Senator from Texas evidently believes, but which I do not believe, then will not the effect be that the farmers' eyes will be opened, and he will then come to the aid of the Senator from Texas in helping to remove this burden from the country? And if, on the other hand, the farmer of the West finds that he has been receiving a gold brick and that he suffers no loss from the removal of this nominal protection, will he not be ready then to vote his own convictions without the corrupting influence of the idea that he has been deriving some benefit out of this tariff?

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to the Senator's first question I will say that if the farmer can be made to understand that the Republican Party desires to repeal the duty on his products, and does not intend to repeal the duty on the manufactured commodities which he must buy, then, undoubtedly, he will take his revenge on that party, but if we help to inflict this injustice we will lose the benefit of the farmer's resentment against the Republican Party. I can not bring myself to believe that we can make people love us by punishing them, and yet that must be true if we can convert the farmers of the United States to the Democratic Party by levying a tax on what they buy and taking it off of what they sell.

The second question of the Senator from Nebraska assumes that the duties on agricultural products do not affect their price. That is true as to some of those products, but it is not true as to others. Our farmers understand that as well as the Senator from Nebraska or myself, but they also understand that a duty which does not increase the price at which they sell does not increase the price at which the city people buy. In an audience of 500 farmers it might be possible for you to convince 100 of them that, due to causes which are not always plain, but which the most thoughtful men can comprehend, the duty on some agricultural products will not benefit the farmer. But if you convince 100 of that audience of that, the other 400 will go about their several ways shaking their heads and rejecting an argument which tells them that a duty enhances the price of what they buy and does not enhance the price of what they sell.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi first, and then to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Texas permit a question? Following up the second part of the question of the Senator from Nebraska, understanding that the Senator from Texas agrees with the Senator from Nebraska that these duties have been put there to hoodwink the farmer and that they have hoodwinked him, could we not perhaps get his love by unhoodwinking him, undeceiving him? Suppose, after we pass this bill, because of the infinitesimal amount of wheat produced in Canada, the price of wheat does not fall.

Mr. BAILEY. Then they will say that our whole argument on the tariff question is unsound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg pardon. We have never contended that where we exported a large surplus of a product protection could raise the price. So the farmers could not say that, but they would say to the Republicans, "For years you have deceived us with a siren song that this protection on wheat added to our profit. We have discovered that it does not. Now we do not believe any of the fish story at all."

Mr. BAILEY. That is presuming too much on the farmer's ignorance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BAILEY. Just a moment, and then I will. For the first time in a hundred years we have reached the point where a duty, whether for protection or revenue, does affect the price of wheat. When the surplus is the larger part of a crop, as it is of the cotton crop, it is absolutely certain that no duty can enhance the price of the part of the crop consumed in this country. But the price can be enhanced by a tariff duty, notwithstanding a surplus, and I call in witness of that fact the repeated denunciation of Democratic Senators and Representatives against the American manufacturers who have sold their surplus products in the markets of the world cheaper than they have sold them here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if the Senator from Texas will permit, there is this difference, and it is an immense one. A manufacturing industry may overproduce what is needed for the home market and send products abroad year after year and hold up the home market for the price equal to the tariff privilege. But it is because, from the very nature of the business, the manufacturers can combine and form trusts and control prices, protected behind the tariff wall, and the farmer, from the very nature of his business, has never done that in the world and can never do it.

Now, then, just one word more. It is not the quantity of surplus that makes a product a world product, but it is the fact that the man has produced more than he can sell in the home market, and whenever that is the case the supply has outrun the demand in the home market and he must seek an outlet for the surplus abroad. But the moment he has to seek it, that moment he seeks the world's price and not the home price, unless the natural operation of things can be interrupted by the formation of trusts.

The Republican Party taught for years that if you put a tariff upon products until you had encouraged home industry to equal the demand, then finally competition in the home market would bring things down to a price below that at which you could have bought in the world's market. That would have happened in the course of time wherever the protective duty had worked to establish and render profitable an industry to such an extent that that industry, operating in America, could produce cheaper than abroad, as can be done now in the steel business. It would have operated that way but for the fact that these large industrial enterprises of a manufacturing character are necessarily in a few hands, the few heads attached to which can hatch combinations to maintain the price in the home to the level of the foreign price plus that of the tariff, whereas the farmers' business is in the hands of forty-odd million people, and it is absolutely impossible for them to combine. In the natural order of things, after building up, hothousing, artificially, by law, at the expense of the people for a long time an industry of some description, the result was that after a while, if it succeeded at all, it might succeed to the point where it could outproduce the foreigner, in the sense of producing either a better article at the same price or a cheaper article of the same quality and without combination the price would have fallen.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, in a part of what he has just said, the Senator from Mississippi furnishes an additional argument in support of my contention. He says that the farmers can not combine, and do not combine; and I say that therefore it must be less burdensome to others for us to leave a duty on what they produce.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true.

Mr. BAILEY. He says that the manufacturers can combine, and do combine; and I say that, therefore, they ought to be the first people exposed to the competition of the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that I heartily concur. I wish to God we could begin at the other end of the line.

Mr. BAILEY. The fallacy of the theory that the price of wheat in this country is determined by its price in the markets of the world is easily exposed. There is not a Senator on this floor, including the Senator from Mississippi, who does not know that if our wheat crop this year should fall below 500,000,000 bushels the Chicago price would rise above the Liverpool price, the cost of transportation considered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You mean by that simply this: That if the production of wheat reached a point where we would have to import wheat, the price at the point of consumption would be larger than at the point whence it was exported. Nobody will dispute that. If you mean a case where the quantity of American consumption falls so that we would have to import wheat, then I would not deny the proposition. But as long as there was a surplus of home production over home consumption, I do deny your proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator ought to know that a 500,000,000-bushel crop would not bring us under the necessity of importing wheat. It would undoubtedly place us under the necessity of enlarging our use of corn for breadstuff, but no wheat would be imported unless we take the duty off Canadian wheat, and then we would import that instead of supplementing a short wheat crop with corn. If the Senator from Mississippi will read the report of Israel T. Hatch, made to a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, he will find it stated there that when they passed the Canadian treaty of 1854 it was believed that the price of wheat was regulated in the markets of the world, but that our experience for six years under that treaty exploded that theory. Hatch was a Treasury expert.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But does the Senator from Texas agree that that opinion by an expert was correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi must address the Chair and get the consent of the Senator on the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg pardon.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator believe that that opinion is a correct opinion?

Mr. BAILEY. In my judgment, that opinion was justified by the course of wheat prices which he then had before him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At a time when we were raising twice as much wheat as we could consume, as was the case then, I would deny the proposition. We are now at a point where we export very largely the crop.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken in his estimate of our wheat exports.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not mean mathematically twice as large, but I mean a great deal more.

Mr. BAILEY. We exported less than 18 per cent of our wheat crop last year; and, as a matter of fact, it may happen, and it will happen in any short-crop year, that the price of wheat in this country will be above the Liverpool price, the cost of transportation considered. If the price is fixed at Liverpool, how could the price here be above the price there?

Generally it is true that the price of the surplus will fix the price of the crop, and that is as true of factory products as it is of farm products. But that is subject to a number of limitations, and it grows diminishingly less true as consumption meets production. That is exactly what has happened now. If the Senator from Mississippi and others had joined me, I would now be charging that the Republican Party has maintained a duty on agricultural products when they were of no special benefit to the farmer; but that just as soon as we had reached a point where the farmer will derive some benefit from those duties it proposes to repeal them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In connection with the forcible argument which the Senator is now making in regard to wheat, I want to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi and others, who are taking the opposite view, seem to assume that all that is raised upon the farms of the Northwest is wheat, which is exported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just happened to use that as an illustration.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As a matter of fact, we raise barley by the million bushels, and we do not export it. We raise flax by the million bushels, and we do not export it. We raise broom corn; we raise vegetables; we raise rye; we raise oats; and we raise numerous articles of which we have no surplus to export. It is not fair to assume that the only subject of discussion in connection with the products of the northwestern farms is wheat. While the argument in regard to wheat has been destroyed by the Senator from Texas and others, it is not the only product that is affected by this trade agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not like to be left in an attitude where it might seem I was disingenuous in an argument. I happened to use wheat as an illustration because the Senator from Texas was talking about it. I freely admit that upon all products which are not exported, but which are imported, the removal of the tariff, in the absence of other controlling causes, will or ought to reduce the price. Then, I take the Democratic position that where untaxing a product is removing the tariff tax from a product reduces the price to the consumer it merely gives to the consumer an advantage that God gave him and which he ought to have.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then the Senator from Mississippi is drifting into this position. He justifies the removal of the tariff from rye and justifies leaving a tariff of $2.25 a gallon on whisky. He justifies taking the tariff off barley and keeping a tariff of 25 cents a gallon on beer and a tariff of 45 cents a hundred on malt. For the benefit of whom? The consumer of beer and whisky? No; for the benefit of the Brewers' Trust and the Distillers' Trust.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not responsible for the curious inferences that may be drawn by the Senator. I am responsible only for what I have said. His inferences are his own; and, like the scriptural definition of man, they are "fearfully and wonderfully made." I stick to what I said, and I decline to have put into my mouth what was said by the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, although I did not, when I took the floor, expect to occupy a fraction of the time which I have consumed, I believe I will trespass upon the patience of the Senate a little further while I point out to Democratic Senators who think this trade agreement is "a step in the right direction," that as to many of its principal items it affords the manufacturer a higher protection than the existing law. When it was reported to the Senate I made that statement and asserted that by a simple process of addition and subtraction I could sustain it. I will now undertake to do so. First, let us take cattle. The present duty on cattle worth more than $14 per head is 27½ per cent, and therefore the duty on a Canadian steer worth $40 would be $11. The present duty on the meat which that steer will dress is 1½ cents per pound, and, assuming that the steer will dress 800 pounds—certainly he will not dress more than that—the protection to the packer is $12. Thus, under the existing law, the packer pays $11 for the privilege of importing a steer and enjoys a protection of $12 on the dressed meat, giving him a net protection of only $1. Under this treaty the $11 now paid by the packer is entirely remitted, but the duty on the dressed meat is only reduced from 1½ cents per pound to 1¼ cents per pound, or from $12 on the whole carcass under the existing law to $10 under this treaty. So, Mr. President, while under the existing law the packer pays $11 to import a steer and has $12 protection on the meat, under this treaty he pays nothing to import the steer and has $10 protection on the meat, making a net gain of $9 to the packer, with a net loss of $11 to the Government. Is there any fault with that arithmetic? It is a simple calculation.

Will this bill reduce the price of beef? It reduces the duty on it a quarter of a cent per pound. Is anybody simple-minded enough to believe that this quarter of a cent will ever reach the beef-eaters of the United States? Oh, no; beef is not sold to the consumer in fractional parts of a cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me illustrate this same iniquity with wheat.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator leaves that point——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas prefers not to yield now.

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If this is a mathematical proposition, of course it ought to be based on facts which exist. I understand that no beef cattle of that grade are imported from Canada for packing.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice in the report of the total imports from Canada, beef cattle of the grade the Senator mentions do not exceed the receipts of five days at the South Omaha stockyards. So it is practically negligible.

Mr. BAILEY. However many or however few are imported, the fact remains that they are imported; and the tariff duty prevents the importation of a large number.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not for packing.

Mr. BAILEY. The attorney of the Cattle Raisers' Association stated before our committee that Chicago buyers were in Canada at that time to buy cattle.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has demonstrated very clearly if they have not imported cattle from there, there will be every opportunity to do so if this change is made.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to direct his attention to the Province of Alberta, which can be seen on that map yonder. It is about the size of the State of Texas, and it is every bit as good a cattle country. A number of Americans drive their cattle and sheep up there to feed and fatten them and get them in a good condition. They can raise as many cattle in the Province of Alberta as they can raise in the State of Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true. One of the largest ranches in the State of Texas sends cattle from our State to Canada for the purpose of maturing them, and the manager of that ranch is, or at least has been, president of the American Live Stock Association.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me one word further?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] can tell him how he has taken sheep up into that country and fed and fattened them.

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator that men who are interested with me have taken many and many a head of cattle up into Canada to fatten. You can take yearlings from this country to Canada and they will mature into beef cattle, I think, at least 12 months before they can possibly mature in this country.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. The strongest feed I know of anywhere is Canadian buffalo grass.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks that sending his sheep or cattle up into Canada to fatten was injurious to the people of the United States, and if so why so patriotic a gentleman would have permitted them to graze on the grasses of Canada and injure the people of the United States by bringing them back to sell them.

Mr. SMOOT. If the American people have to buy cattle from some other country it would be an entirely different proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, assuming that the tariff, as I say it does, increases the price of the domestic article to the extent of the tariff, and thus keeps out the imported article, that would explain the small importation. But what will you say when the packer is permitted to pay $11 less for all the American steers which he buys?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The answer to that might be taken from the mouths of some of the Senators on the Republican side who have announced——

Mr. BAILEY. I would not accept their answer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Who have announced that if this tariff wall is taken down it will confer a great benefit upon the Canadian producers, who will be able to derive American prices.

Mr. BAILEY. But I do not say that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is what they have said.

Mr. BAILEY. But you can not make me responsible for what even the most excellent of them say. I said the result would be that their price would rise and our price would fall until an equilibrium would be established; and I am willing to record that statement here, and the years to come will verify it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Texas, as he was making this comparison in mathematics, claimed that the duty would be $11 on the steer on foot, and then $12 practically for the dressed beef. Does he mean to argue that the remittal of $11, entailing a consequent drop in the price of American cattle, would have no effect upon the price of beef to those who buy beef? I know there would be less revenue to the Government if we imported any considerable amount, and there might be a loss to the cattle raiser; but would the remittal of $11 on the Canadian importation and the loss of $11 to the American producer have no effect on the price to the consumer, notwithstanding the duty of 1¼ cents a pound on the dressed beef?

Mr. BAILEY. Absolutely none, Mr. President. If the people consumed cattle, then to remit the $11 on cattle would reduce the price; but the people eat beef, and the reduction on dressed beef is only one-quarter of a cent, which is not susceptible of a division that can be transmitted to the consumer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I can not see exactly how the American people can eat beef which had not been cattle.

Mr. BAILEY. Cattle are the raw material, beef is the finished product, and the Senator knows that a tax on the raw material does not affect the price of the finished product; but only affects the cost of producing it. The cost of cattle affects the cost of producing beef just as the cost of wool affects the cost of producing woolen goods, but you could give the woolen manufacturer his wool, not only free of tax, but free of all cost, and if you left him a duty of 50 per cent on his woolen goods he would charge just as much for them as he would if he paid 50 per cent on his wool. The Senator agrees to that, does he not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do; but that comes back to the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, where he claims that on account of the smaller number of those engaged in that kind of business it goes beyond and transcends any protection at all and simply becomes a question of capital and of power to combine.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, if the Democratic Party obtains control of this Government, we shall settle the trust question in the criminal courts, and not at the customhouses. Taxation is not a proper means of punishing crimes. When the shoe manufacturers petitioned us to put hides on the free list they said it would help to break up the trust. We put hides on the free list, and in 90 days the Leather Trust enlarged its operations and increased the price of its products. No; the customhouse is not the place to break up the trusts; the criminal court is the proper place for that work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Texas will permit me, ought we not to break up the trusts in two ways—first, by not tempting them to commit the crime, which the tariff does; and, second, by punishing them if they do commit the crime?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Mississippi and myself perfectly agree that they ought never to be tempted to commit the crime by a tariff levied for protection; but as the Senator from Mississippi and myself must levy a tariff for the purpose of raising revenue to support the Government, he and I contend that the wool manufacturer when he imports his wool ought to be compelled to pay taxes for the support of the Government the same as our fellow-citizens do when they import their woolen goods. I assume that the Senator from South Carolina agrees with that also.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been wondering, Mr. President, where the temptation comes to the manufacturer in Great Britain, a free-trade country, where they have just as many trusts as we have in our Nation.

Mr. BAILEY. Not as many, but they have them there. None of us have ever doubted that there are certain commodities which can be subjected to trusts and combinations, irrespective of the tariff. But the Senator does not doubt that if trusts can be organized under a system of free trade, they can be organized more easily under a protective tariff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, Mr. President, there is this difference, too, if the Senator from Texas will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A trust can not succeed in Great Britain except in one way, and that is either by producing cheaper, so that it can sell cheaper to the consumer, or by obtaining such a reputation for the quality of its goods that it virtually monopolizes the market, or very nearly so. It is not aided by the law in doing either. Nobody objects to anybody getting as large a business as he can, provided he does it by either bettering the quality or lowering the price of the article he is producing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is interesting to see the zeal and avidity with which certain Democratic Senators always come to the rescue of a foreign Government as against ours. I think the Senator from Mississippi is drawing on his imagination when he pictures the trusts of Great Britain as being beneficent institutions.

Mr. BAILEY. Democratic Senators do not come to the rescue of foreign governments; but they endeavor always to come to the rescue of the American consumer.

Now, let me make another illustration. This time with wheat. The present duty on wheat is 25 cents a bushel, and it requires practically 4½ bushels of wheat to grind into a barrel of flour. Therefore, under the existing law, the miller pays to the Government of the United States $1.12½ for importing enough wheat to grind into a barrel of flour. Under the existing law the duty on flour is 25 per cent, and the average price of flour imported from Canada is $5 a barrel. The average of last year, as I now recall, was four dollars and eighty odd cents, but for the sake of the round numbers we will say $5 a barrel. It is sometimes a little more than that and sometimes a little less. At $5 a barrel, 25 per cent would give a protection of $1.25 a barrel. Thus the miller pays to the Government $1.12½ when he imports the wheat out of which he makes a barrel of flour, and has a protection of $1.25 against the Canadian miller's competition. The net protection to him on his flour above what he pays on his wheat is 12½ cents per barrel.

This reciprocity treaty completely repeals the duty on wheat and saves to the American miller the $1.12½ which he pays under the existing law to the Government for the privilege of importing 4½ bushels of wheat; but it still leaves a duty of 50 cents per barrel on flour. Now, make your addition and subtraction. His net protection under the existing law is 12½ cents per barrel. His net protection under this treaty is 50 cents a barrel. Thus this measure multiplies the miller's protection by four. Will any Senator controvert those simple figures? Will any Senator deny that calculation?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to call his attention to the fact——

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. That in addition to the duty of 50 cents a barrel on flour there is a duty of 12½ cents a hundred on the bran and shorts, which is equal to $2.50 a ton.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. And the statistics reported by the Tariff Commission show that there is a difference on bran, shorts, and millfeed of from $2.50 to $3 a ton, and the farmer can not even get the benefit of that under this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true. Now, Mr. President, will any fair-minded man contend that it is just and fair to make the American farmer sell his wheat to the miller free of tax, and then compel him to pay a tax on it when he buys it back in the shape of flour. Not only, sir, does this treaty force the farmer to sell free wheat and buy taxed flour made of his free wheat, but it does not even allow him to purchase the by-products of his wheat on the same terms and conditions as he sold it. Is this just? Is this fair? Is this honest? The farmer bestows more labor upon producing wheat than the miller does in grinding it.

The farmer plows the ground; he sows his wheat; he watches it through flood and drought until harvest time, and reaps it. He thrashes it, then takes it to the mill and sells it. Through long and anxious months he watches over his crop and tends it, and yet he shall have no tax upon the product of his land and of his labor, but the miller who converts it by machinery into flour in less time than it took the farmer to haul it from his granary to the mill shall have his 50 cents on every barrel for the process. When, sir, did machinery and inventive genius derive a higher right to the consideration of the American Government than the man of flesh and blood made in the image of his God?

Mr. President, these inequalities and these injustices run through all this bill, but as the hour is such that I can not point them all out this afternoon, I will address myself to this subject again at some more convenient time.

Mr. President, I have already detained the Senate this afternoon longer than I expected to do. The Senate, of course, will bear with me or has borne with me patiently, because I have cheerfully submitted to a number of interruptions. I believe that I will now yield the floor, and at some convenient time—not to-morrow, because I have another matter concerning my duties here which will require my attention then—but at some convenient time I will resume and conclude what I desire to say on this subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 20, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 19, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee that in the dispensation of Thy providence Thou didst set apart one day in the seven for rest, reflection, and worship; that a large majority of our people appreciate its worth and feel the uplift of that spirit which makes for righteousness in the soul, in the home, in the State, or Nation through its observance. Grant that it may more and more obtain in the hearts of our people. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 17, 1911, was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6733) to accept and fund the bequest of Gertrude M. Hubbard.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reserve objection to the consideration of the bill in order to have some explanation made of it.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the bill be read. Is there objection to that?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask that the bill be read, if the gentleman from Arkansas objects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas objects. That strikes the bill from the calendar.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up the motion to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the consideration of the bill H. R. 767, the pension bill on the Calendar for Motions to Discharge Committees.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-nine Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, as a quorum is not present.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 78.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. It has been demonstrated there is a quorum present.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 115, answered "present" 11, not voting 107, as follows:

YEAS—154.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 74, by Mr. LODGE——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. LODGE. I shall ask that the resolution be taken up to-morrow and disposed of.

WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes. I should like if the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] were present while the joint resolution is under discussion. I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to say in this connection that when this matter was reported on Friday last and unanimous consent was asked for its present consideration, I objected for two reasons. The first was because the joint resolution had not been considered by the Senate, and in its then form I wanted to examine it carefully and see if there was any objection to it. The second reason for my objection to the consideration was because I recalled the fact that the governor of the State of New York had addressed a letter to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, in opposition to a measure of this general character, and also to Representative ALEXANDER, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, which letters were printed, as I recollected, in the RECORD.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has very kindly furnished me a copy of the letter of Gov. Dix, of New York, to Representative ALEXANDER on the subject, and also a letter from the governor of New York to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] dated February 24, 1911. I ask that the letter of the governor to the Senator from Ohio be read, and that the other be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter indicated, and the other letter will be printed without reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, February 24, 1911.

Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BURTON: I am informed that the so-called Alexander power bill, relating to the use of Niagara River water for hydraulic purposes, is still in the hands of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and, it is understood, will not be passed, and that you have introduced a concurrent resolution proposing to extend the term of the act of 1906, which bears your name, and which would expire by limitation on June 29, proximo, during the lifetime of the new treaty with Great Britain relative to boundary waters.

I have recently communicated to Representative ALEXANDER my views as to the inadequacy of his bill, and I inclose a copy of my letter to him. If this bill should be enacted it should only be after the adoption of amendments to cover the points I have made against it, and in which our State legislature has since concurred. If, however, there is to be no bill enacted on the subject at the present session of Congress, then your resolution should, I am sure, be adopted.

It seems to me that provision for the permanent adjustment of this whole matter should be based upon conferences between the Federal authorities and the authorities of this State, and I would be obliged if you would suggest the appropriate Federal officials with whom conferees in behalf of the State might take up this subject. It would seem, also, that a period of two years would be abundant time within which to reach a definite basis for the final disposition of this matter, and, if I am correct as to that, it would seem as though an extension of the Federal act of 1906 for a period of two years instead of for a term of five years would be desirable.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN A. DIX.

The letter to Representative ALEXANDER was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 16, 1911.

Hon. D. S. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The bill known as the Alexander power bill, relating to the use of the hydraulic power of the Niagara River, now pending before your committee, involves interests of very great importance to the State of New York. The act which the bill would amend, usually known as the Burton Act, permitted grants to be made by the Secretary of War to individuals, companies, or corporations for diversion of water for the creation of power which then were, in 1906, actually using such water for that purpose; but that act contained a restriction limiting future use to not over 8,600 cubic feet per second to any one individual, and to not exceeding 15,600 cubic feet per second to all users of water from the Niagara River or from the Erie Canal.

The western level of the Erie Canal being fed from the waters of Lake Erie, a certain quantity of its flow on reaching the eastern end of that level becomes surplus and available for hydraulic purposes. Any use of that surplus should be in conjunction with continuous and unhampered supervision on the part of the State, in order to preserve the navigation interests of that canal. In 1906 there were several users of river water at the city of Niagara Falls who were independent of each other in interest, and there were several users at Lockport of surplus canal waters which had their source in Lake Erie, and who used under the terms of a permit previously granted by the State. That permit, originally made in 1826, was revoked by the superintendent of public works of the State, and any other disposition of that surplus to arise on completion of the canal improvement now in progress is being held in abeyance until after legislation shall be enacted by the State with reference thereto.

I believe there is no instance occurring prior to 1906 of any attempt on the part of the Federal Government to claim any jurisdiction to regulate the use of the waters of the Erie Canal after the same have once entered the State's canal system. The Federal act of 1906 did not allow the issuing of permits to any single interest then existing or thereafter to come into existence, whereby use of all the water which may be taken from the Niagara River for power purposes could come under the control of a single interest, and any injurious monopoly in the product of that power was thereby guarded against. Under the Alexander bill, if a consolidation of interest between the present users at Niagara Falls already has, or shall hereafter occur, the whole of the 20,000 cubic feet per second authorized by the treaty of May 13, 1910, with Great Britain, could be granted to a single user or to a combination of users. Since electric current has become the most valuable product of hydraulic power, Niagara power will no doubt continue to be used as it now is for the development of that current, and oppressive results may be anticipated to follow from any unregulated monopoly thereover.

The Burton Act treated the use of Erie Canal surplus, arising on the canal levels fed by Lake Erie, for power purposes, as coming within the right of the Federal Government to license. The Alexander bill now proposes to reassert that jurisdiction in the Federal Government. That claim on the part of the Federal Government is unsound as well as unjust to the State of New York. The Erie Canal lies wholly within this State and was built at the sole expense of New York, with the acquiescence of the Federal Congress at the time, and it has since been maintained at vast expense to this State but with great benefit to the country at large. Assuming but not conceding that Congress as against the State could now justly interfere and place a limit upon the amount of water from the Niagara River to feed the Erie Canal, nevertheless such water having once entered the canal passes into an artificial channel wholly within the State and within its natural jurisdiction. The treaty referred to undertakes to place no limit whatever nor to require the Federal Government to limit the amount of water which may be drawn from Lake Erie for the purposes of existing canals in the State of

New York. Who shall use the surplus of the Erie Canal when the water reaches Lockport or other points, even though the source thereof was Lake Erie, and under what restrictions and on what terms, is a matter which should rest with the State of New York alone to determine.

In my opinion, the Alexander bill should be so amended as to prevent a monopoly in the product of the power affected, to remove unnecessary restrictions upon the number of those persons or corporations located upon sites available for use of power, and which may desire to share in its use, and so as to leave New York State with the sole and undisputed jurisdiction to control the use of Erie Canal waters at all points within her own boundaries. The question of the transmission of power originating in the natural waters of the State of New York to points without the State, to the prejudice of New York and perhaps to the prejudice of the United States as well, suggests itself.

I am informed that the terms of the Alexander bill will operate to exclude one company already incorporated by the State from any participation in the power water which may be granted. I find that when the State authorized on its part some years ago the use of the river water for commercial purposes, no limitations were imposed for the protection of the public interest, or consideration exacted for the benefits to accrue to the users.

In view of the importance of this subject and because of the impropriety of my assuming to dispose of it on behalf of the State without consultation with the legislature, I intend to submit the subject to the State legislature and I request that congressional action on the Alexander bill be delayed until the interests and desires of the State may be properly determined and made known.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN A. DIX.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply desire to add that in view of the letters of the governor of New York explaining the situation, I have no further objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, after the word "act" in line 6, to strike out the words "to remain in full force and virtue during the life of the said treaty, save in so far as any portion thereof may be found inapplicable or already complied with" and to insert "for two years or until June 29, 1913," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the aforesaid act be, and they are hereby, extended from June 29, 1911, being the date of the expiration of the operation of said act, for two years or until June 29, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments to the preamble, so as to make the preamble read:

Whereas the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes," approved June 29, 1906, and extended by joint resolution (public resolution No. 56) for a period of two years, approved March 3, 1909, will expire by limitation June 29, 1911: Therefore be it

The amendments to the preamble were agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar will be proceeded with, under Rule VIII.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts, approved March 4, 1911, was announced as the first business on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

LANDS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 20) directing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding legal title of the United States to sublots Nos. 31, 32, and 33 of original lot No. 3, square No. 80, in the city of Washington, D. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill has been heretofore read. On page 1, lines 3 and 4, I move to strike out the words "the present," and to insert the words "William H. Rapley and the estate of William W. Rapley."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel was announced as next in order.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the bill may go over this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 2117) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 2, line 7, after the word "dollars," at the end of the paragraph, I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the pay of any officer now on waiting orders.

Mr. GALLINGER. It should read, "Provided also."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; "Provided also," as it follows a proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill as to what officers and to what extent or limit the longevity applies, and whether there is a maximum limit below the 40 per cent longevity as to the officers of high rank?

Mr. SMOOT. There is a limit that the amount shall not exceed 40 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; that is the law now, for instance, as to the Army and the Navy. But for the Army, in the case of the general officers and the field officers, there is a maximum which is less than the regular salary and 40 per cent additional. I want to know if that factor is in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; that factor is in this bill, the same as in the law for the Army and the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. This does not raise the salary and pay of the officers?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; this bill raises the salaries. The Surgeon General to-day gets $5,000, and this bill raises his salary to $6,000, in conformity with the salaries of the officers of the same grade in the Army and the Navy. It raises the salary of the assistant surgeon generals from $2,900 to $4,000; the senior surgeons from $2,500 to $3,500; the surgeons from $2,500 to $3,000; and the passed assistant surgeons from $2,000 to $2,500.

Mr. WARREN. Then I am to understand the Senator that this is to bring the salaries of that service on a par only with the salaries of the officers of the Army, and not above?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the object. It does not increase the salaries above those of the same grades in the Army and the Navy.

Mr. President, on page 2 of the bill, line 22, I offer an amendment to strike out "seven" and insert "five," and also to strike out "two hundred."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to say just one word, and only a word, on the general purpose of this bill.

This is, as every Senator knows, a very efficient and extremely important service. There has been no change in the salaries of these officers since the year 1889. It is proper that they should be increased, as it seems to me, to the amount provided in the bill. As to the Senator's amendment, I do not quite understand it, and I should like to have it stated so that we may understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 22 and 23——

Mr. GALLINGER. I refer to the first amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the amendment which has been agreed to?

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not know it had been agreed to. I should like to have it again stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided also, That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the pay of any officer now on waiting orders.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in explanation of that amendment I wish to say that at the present time there are three surgeons on waiting orders and one passed assistant surgeon on waiting orders.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the amendment is entirely proper, and I do not object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment last offered by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed on page 2, in lines 22 and 23, to strike out the words "seven thousand two hundred" and in lieu thereof to insert "five thousand," so as to read:

The allowance for baggage and personal effects to an officer in changing stations shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed in any case 5,000 pounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAMAGE TO LIGHTHOUSE PROPERTY.

The bill (S. 2053) providing for the disposition of moneys recovered on account of injury or damage to lighthouse property was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

HARBOR REGULATIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1072) to amend section 895 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, after line 5, to strike out:

No barge, lighter, or scow owned, controlled, leased, or employed by the owner or lessee of any wharf used for private business, or for any private purpose, and not used for public or general wharfage, shall be permitted to lie in front of or overlap any adjoining wharf or wharves without the written consent of the owner or lessee of such adjoining wharf or wharves.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 3, before the word "That" to insert "Sec. 895a," and on page 3, line 3, after the word "conviction," to strike out "shall be subject to the penalty provided herein" and insert "shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, in the discretion of the court," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, making harbor regulations, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 895a. That it shall be unlawful for any owner or occupant of any wharf or dock, any master or captain of any vessel, or any person or persons to cast, throw, drop, or deposit any stone, gravel, sand, ballast, dirt, oyster shells, or ashes in the water in any part of the Potomac River or its tributaries in the District of Columbia, or on the shores of said river below high-water mark, unless for the purpose of making a wharf, after permission has been obtained from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for that purpose, which wharf shall be sufficiently inclosed and secured so as to prevent injury to navigation.

"That it shall be unlawful for any owner or occupant of any wharf or dock, any captain or master of any vessel, or any other person or persons to cast, throw, deposit, or drop in any dock or in the waters of the Potomac River or its tributaries in the District of Columbia any dead fish, fish offal, dead animals of any kind, condemned oysters in the shell, watermelons, cantaloupes, vegetables, fruits, shavings, hay, straw, ice, snow, filth, or trash of any kind whatsoever.

"That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to interfere with the work of improvement in or along the said river and harbor under the supervision of the United States Government.

"That any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not rise to make an objection to the bill, but I should like to know what we are voting on. Those amendments in the form stated at the desk are absolutely blind, and nobody can tell what they mean unless he has a copy of the bill before him. I should like very much if the chairman of the committee which reported the bill would tell us just what it means.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] reported the bill; but I will say that, as I understand, the only change in the existing law is to prohibit the dumping of certain materials in the waters of the Potomac River. Those materials are stone, gravel, and sand, which the present law does not prohibit. That is the only change in the existing law.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LARCENY OF PUBLIC PROPERTY FROM DISTRICT WORKHOUSE.

The bill (S. 1081) to provide for punishment for larceny of public property from the workhouse and the reformatory of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "that," to insert "whenever"; in the same line, after the word "any," to strike out "larceny as hereinafter provided of"; in line 7, before the word "in," to strike out "any"; on page 2, line 1, after the word "both," to strike out "said" and insert "the"; in the same line, before the word "reformatory," to strike out "said" and insert "the"; in the same line, after the word "reformatory," to insert "of the District of Columbia"; and in line 4, after the word "workhouse," to strike out "whenever any such property"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any property of the United States of America, or of the property of the District of Columbia, either or both, or in the custody or control of the said United States or the District of Columbia, either or both, or in the custody or control of the officers, agents, or employees thereof respectively, in any State or Territory of the United States other than the District of Columbia, which has been or shall be loaned, delivered, given, purchased, provided, or obtained for use at, about, or in either or both the workhouse or the reformatory of the District of Columbia, or which has been or shall be used or employed in any manner at, about, or in either or both said reformatory or workhouse, shall be brought into the District of Columbia, or any other place within the jurisdiction of the United States, by any person who shall feloniously take and carry away the same under circumstances which constitute larceny in the District of Columbia, as provided in the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia, and the amendments thereto, shall be and continue larceny in the district of Columbia, or in any place within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXHIBITION OF OBSCENE PICTURES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 2600) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prevent the exhibition of obscene, lewd, indecent, or vulgar pictures in public places of amusement in the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHIVELY. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

CHANGES IN DISTRICT PERMANENT HIGHWAY SYSTEM.

The bill (S. 2599) to authorize certain changes in the plan for the permanent system of highways for that portion of the District of Columbia lying west of Fourteenth Street, south of Taylor Street, east of Rock Creek Park, and north of Newton Street NW., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prepare a new highway plan for that portion of the District lying west of Fourteenth Street, south of Taylor Street, east of Rock Creek Park, and north of Newton Street NW., under the provisions contained in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and an amendment to that act approved June 28, 1898; but section 4 of the amendment shall not apply to the territory above described; and Mount Pleasant Street may be extended with a minimum width of 45 feet; Perry Place may be extended with a minimum width of 50 feet; and Fourteenth Street Road may be established with a minimum width of 50 feet; and upon the completion and recording of the new highway plan it shall take the place of and stand for any previous plan for that portion of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATIONS ON COLUMBIA RIVER, OREG.

The bill (S. 2775) to authorize the establishment of fish-cultural stations on the Columbia River or its tributaries in the State of Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to establish two or more fish-cultural stations on the Columbia River or its tributaries in the State of Oregon for the propagation of salmon and other food fishes, and to make the necessary surveys, and purchase sites, construct ponds and buildings, construct, purchase, and hire boats and equipments, and employ such assistance as may be required for the construction and operation of such fish-cultural stations at suitable points to be selected by him, and the number of such stations to be determined by him; and for these purposes $50,000 is authorized to be appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TITLE TO LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1899) to repeal a portion of an act heretofore passed relating to the alienation of the title of the United States to land in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think that bill had better go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the bill is all right.

Mr. HEYBURN. It involves a number of properties.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected" was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I am quite ready to vote now on that bill and the amendments to it, but I think it is rather unusual to compel the consideration of a bill in the absence of the Senator who reported it, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, this is a measure which I think ought to be considered and passed at this session of Congress; and in view of the fact that we shall be engaged almost exclusively on tariff measures, I think we ought to avail ourselves of every opportunity to consider and finally pass this measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	Kern	Reed
Borah	Cullom	Lippitt	Shively
Bourne	Cummins	Lodge	Simmons
Bradley	Curtis	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smoot

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was called away from the city last night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CULBERSON. On the motion to proceed to the consideration of this measure I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, some of us were not present when the bill was read. I should like to know what the bill is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary, without objection, will again report the bill by its title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply wanted to ask a question; that is all. Do I understand that the chairman of the committee who has reported this bill is absent from the city or simply not here?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is not a debatable one.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is not an inquiry of that kind pertinent?

Mr. PENROSE. He is engaged on committee work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who I understand is absent from the city. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "nay," because of the absence of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is unavoidably detained. So I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I do not know how he would vote. So I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a general pair on political matters with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I hardly know whether the pair would apply to this vote or not. I do not know how the Senator from Connecticut would vote on this question. So I will concede that the pair might apply to this vote, and I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I desire to ask if the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WARREN. I am paired with that Senator. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is paired with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted a moment ago under a misapprehension. I find that the Senator with whom I have a general pair, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], is not present. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CRAWFORD (after having voted in the negative). I discover that the chairman of the committee is here now. That was my only objection to proceeding to the consideration of the bill. I desire to change my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withhold my vote because of my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—42.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say in regard to this measure. I voted against the motion to take it up, and I objected to its consideration. I thought that the sentiment of the Senate was so strongly expressed against this legislation on the occasion of a recent vote that there would be no attempt to press it. Only a few days since the Senate, by a large majority, voted to take out of the Constitution of the United States the section under which this legislation only could exist. Of course, if you repeal section 4 of Article I of the Constitution you can not pass any such bill as this, because it is because of the provisions of that section that you are authorized to enact such legislation. I was looking for consistency.

That can not be controverted. No Senator will name any other section of the Constitution or any other provision in it under which this kind of legislation can be enacted. If anyone can name it, I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. My colleague is in error about the vote being in favor of taking section 4 out of the Constitution. The vote of a majority left it in the Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, the vote that will decide it will leave it out.

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking from the record.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was speaking not of the prevailing vote; I was speaking of the number of votes. Let us see. We will not quibble over it. The question is, Are we going to leave section 4 of Article I of the Constitution remain? If we are, we can enact this legislation. If we are not going to allow it to remain, then we can not enact it. That is to say, if section 4 were out of the Constitution, there is no provision under which we can legislate on the subject at all. Now, I should like to know where the consistency is to be found in proposing such legislation as this at this time.

I have been curious to know upon what constitutional provision Senators would rest their support of such legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I had rather thought I should vote for this provision, but if there is no foundation to rest it upon I want to be informed. I had supposed that the Senate voted to retain that provision of the Constitution upon which this could rest. I certainly voted that way, and I thought I was with the majority.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I am not speaking of what the result of the proposed amendment to the Constitution may be. I am referring to the express opinion in the Senate, and basing some surprise upon it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Was not the express opinion in the Senate contrary to the opinion now given by the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. The committee of which both Senators who have spoken are members, one the chairman and the other a member, reported in favor of eliminating section 4 of Article I.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; and the Senator will remember that while one of the Senators joined in a report to eliminate it the other Senator did not join in the report to leave it out.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And the Senate agreed with the latter opinion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I give the Senator from Wyoming the fullest credit for having——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I am simply——

Mr. HEYBURN (continuing). For having not joined with the report of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am trying to ascertain just exactly where I stand on this proposition. I want to vote for the bill now pending. I do not want to vote for it if, as the Senator says, the Senate has decided, or it has been decided, to leave out of the Constitution the section of which this is the foundation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Inasmuch as the question is not decided at all yet and is pending in the House, I think I am justified in the suggestion I made. I think it will be conceded that if the amendment passes Congress and goes to the legislatures it will take out of the Constitution section 4 of Article I.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho evidently forgets that there has been no proposition to take out of section 4 that part of it which relates to the election of Members of the House of Representatives, and the bill before us relates only to Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will turn to page 5 he will find there:

> Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election, or for indorsement at any general election, or election before the legislature of any State, as Senator in the Congress of the United States——

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not rise for the purpose of making that correction. I find I am in error about the application of the amendment to the bill; but I believe that if section 4 of Article I of the Constitution were entirely expunged from the Constitution, nevertheless, such legislation as this could lawfully be passed by Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. On what would it rest?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would rest upon precisely the same foundation as regulations respecting the election of the electors for President and Vice President; and legislation of the same general character has been affirmed and approved and upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States——

Mr. HEYBURN. In what case?

Mr. CUMMINS. With regard to electors for President and Vice President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will find a lack of authority behind that proposition. However, I notice that every time this question has been under consideration—I do not mean this measure, but the principle—much has been said about the laws regulating the election of electors. The provisions of the law and of the Constitution with reference to that matter are separate and distinct and stand upon their own grounds, and it was only calculated to lead the audience away from the consideration of the real question.

I do not intend at this time to make any extended speech on this question, but I merely want to interject into the minds of Senators the inconsistency between those who urge this legislation as being of supreme importance and those who favor taking away from Congress the power to enact it. They can not be right in both propositions. Congress can only do this under the provisions of section 4, making regulations for the election of Senators and Members. If you repeal it, you will find that no law Congress enacts shall provide how a person be elected in a State under State laws can be compelled to abide such control by Congress.

Mr. BORAH rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I did not rise to address my colleague. I thought he was through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to close when I think I have sufficiently interjected the inconsistency of this legislation into the minds of Senators so that they may do what I say in all due respect they have not done before—that is, consider the question. It is very easy to follow a clamor for regulations based upon the assumption that the Members of Congress in both Houses are open to suspicion as violators of the law and must be controlled. It is the play to the galleries, and is based upon an assumption that has no foundation. No Senator here will stand in his place and charge that any other Senator has been guilty of any of the things that are enumerated in this statute. I will pause until some Senator exhibits that zeal in behalf of his demand for this legislation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not on my feet in pursuance of the last suggestion made by the Senator, but I rose a moment ago to ask him a question with reference to his position concerning section 4 of Article I. Section 4 of Article I is still in the Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has not been taken out up to date.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does not the Senator think it might be a wholesome example to the country to pass this legislation, under section 4, and thereby demonstrate the necessity of retaining section 4 in the Constitution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, inasmuch as I am in favor of retaining section 4 in the Constitution, I will join with the Senator from Utah in any legitimate proposition that will bring about that end. Of course I am very strongly opposed to the elimination of section 4 from the Constitution, because it was put there for a good purpose, and it has served a good purpose.

I thought this a proper and a convenient occasion to point the morals of this class of legislation. If we pass this now we say to the country that we are afraid of ourselves. I do not suppose any Member would acknowledge that he was afraid of himself personally, but he is afraid of his neighbor doing something that is discreditable and that ought to be checked. He is afraid of it, but he is afraid to say that he is afraid of it; that is all. This class of legislation reflects upon the dignity, it reflects upon the intellectual integrity of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, when the original legislation was enacted it was vicious enough, but there seems to be a disposition in these times to out-Herod Herod in declaiming against the honesty of those who administer the Government or make its laws. If a Member or other than a Member can rise up and propose some legislation to prevent a Member of the people's chosen representatives from committing a crime he seems to think he has done a great thing, and the newspapers will flash it in large type at the head of their columns, So-and-so introduced a resolution that will hereafter prevent Members of Congress from being criminals. It has become popular. It is a part of the muckraking spirit of the age. It detracts from the character of the Representatives in Congress, and it is heralded among the schools and among the people of the country as an evidence that Congress itself admits that it needs the restraint of these laws. By implication we say we want to be held to prevent us from violating them by a statute. I will be no party to such a tacit admission of the necessity of being restrained from resorting to criminal proceedings to become a Member of the legislative body. You have got to abandon one thing or the other. You have got to abandon the proposal to strike out section 4 of Article I in the Constitution or you have got to abandon this legislation. Just take your choice.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of this legislation. I am in favor of it for the reason that I think our elections even to this body ought to be protected against the things this measure is designed to protect against.

I only rose to say, however, that regardless of the question whether section 4 of Article I of the Constitution remains or not, we have ample power to pass this kind of legislation. No one should be discouraged in supporting this legislation by reason of the possible change which may take place with reference to Article I, section 4. We have always proceeded upon the theory that we can protect the purity of election with reference to presidential electors the same as Representatives. We have legislated in the same way and in the same statute concerning both classes of officers to be elected, and the courts have sustained the statute when it has covered both classes of officers to be elected.

I challenge those who seem to think that the Representatives stand upon a different basis from that of a presidential elector, so far as protecting the purity of elections is concerned, to point to any instance in the statute as supported by the courts wherein that distinction is made.

On the other hand, in each and every instance in which this has gone to the Supreme Court it has gone under a statute which protected presidential electors the same as Representatives, and the court has unhesitatingly supported the proposition that whoever or whatever the Federal official might be, the purity of the election could be controlled and protected in such a way as the wisdom of Congress might deem proper.

For that reason we should not hesitate to pass this class and kind of legislation for fear of a change in the Constitution, because it will not affect the validity, whether it is changed or whether it is not changed, with reference to Article I, section 4.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I cordially indorse any constitutional measure whose purpose is to discourage the use of money in our elections, and I, perhaps, go further than many of my associates, for I am a firm believer in the right, the power, and the duty of the Government to limit the expenditure of money in elections. I believe the States ought to limit it within their jurisdiction, and I believe that the Federal Government ought to limit it within its jurisdiction, because a man who can not induce the people to give him an important office is generally incapable of filling it.

But while I cordially approve the bill as it came to the Senate from the House, I very gravely doubt the power of Congress to enact the amendment which the committee has reported to the Senate. I am a member of the committee from which the report comes, but I did not happen to attend that session of the committee, being otherwise occupied, and had I been present I would at least have reserved the right to say what I now rise to say.

Without having thought this question thoroughly out, Mr. President, this seems to me to assert not only a power that does not exist in the Federal Government, but a power which is liable to a very gross abuse. This amendment assumes that the power of the Federal Government over a primary election is coequal with the power of the Federal Government over a general election. I can not, at least without a further consideration, subscribe to that doctrine. If we have the power to require the publication of the funds contributed to a primary election, the same as when contributed to a general election, then I do not see any escape—although I may revise my opinion in that respect upon a further consideration—from the conclusion that the power of the General Government over a primary is as plenary as it is over a general election. This amendment seems to imply that, and I must dispute therefore our power to enact it. I can not conceive that the General Government can go down into a State and regulate its primary elections.

As the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has already suggested, the Federal Government having the right to supervise an election, it may supervise the election completely, notwithstanding State officers are chosen at the same time as Federal officers. That being established by the Supreme Court some of the States of the Union have felt compelled, in order to withdraw their local affairs from Federal supervision, to order their State elections at a time different from their Federal elections.

If Congress should conclude to exercise this power we will then be compelled, in order to escape this same Federal supervision of our primaries, to nominate our State and county candidates at one primary and our Federal candidates at another primary, or else nominating them all at the same primary, the Federal Government will have the power to supervise and control it.

I do not impeach the good faith of Senators hastily. I will not now impeach their good faith. Yet I can not refrain from noticing the fact that the Senators who have persistently and consistently resisted legislation of this kind are the advocates and proponents of this amendment. I do not say all of them are, because some of our own people, in their anxiety to procure a publication touching the general election, have consented to this.

If Senators on that side had not insisted something like two years upon an amendment to the House bill at that time, this bill would not be here to-day.

The Republican majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections insisted upon an amendment to the House bill which confined the publication to a period subsequent to the election. I protested against that then, and in that protest I was joined by every Democratic member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We followed that amendment from the committee room to the open Senate and renewed our protest here, and an examination of the roll call will show that every Democratic Senator, without exception, I believe, voted to require that publication before as well as after the election.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Texas yield for several questions which I wish to ask, largely to obtain the opinion of the Senator from Texas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not conceded that regulations pertaining to registration, the time of holding the polls open, the form of ballot, and so forth, are subjects of Federal law under the Constitution?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, I would question registration. I do not question the power of the Federal Government to appoint registrars under a State law that requires registration.

Mr. BURTON. At any rate, the Federal laws can provide some form of registration. Is not the primary just as much a part of the final selection of Members of Congress, and so forth, as is registration and other regulations which are within the power of the Federal Government?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no. The Senator from Ohio will not insist upon that when he gives it his attention. The one is merely a means of identifying the voter and establishing his right to cast a lawful ballot, while the other is wholly a matter concerning a party. For instance, the Senator from Ohio is of such high character and intelligence that I should like to have him in the Democratic Party, but so long as he maintains his present views I would not be willing to have him in the Democratic primary. [Laughter.] The Senator from Ohio is entitled, under any law ever suggested for the control of Federal elections, to vote for a Representative in Congress, but under no rule ever yet suggested by the most visionary advocate of party disruption would the Senator from Ohio be entitled to enter a Democratic primary. The difference between identifying the voter at the general election and the partisan at the primary of his party is as wide as the poles.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator will accept my thanks for his complimentary words. What we are seeking to do, however, is to control the choice so that it may be a fair and an honest choice of the people. Is it not true that in many localities the selection made by the primary is absolutely conclusive, one party being so predominant?

Mr. BAILEY. That is true; but, Mr. President, it is not every regrettable condition in this world that is subject to Federal cure.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. BAILEY. And the control of a party primary must rest with the State. The Senator from Ohio is not more earnestly opposed to the use of money in elections than I am. I would go, perhaps, further than he would in that direction. I would restrict the right of a man to use money in elections because I am sure that there is no taint matching in its evil effect upon our public life the use of money. I would make it so that a poor man of talent, patriotism, and character could offer himself without being subject to a disadvantage against the richest man in America.

I would make it so that a man's addresses to the judgment and conscience of the voter should control, rather than that subtle and secret influence that addresses itself to the cupidity of the voter. I would make it impossible for any man's bank account to be potential in either a primary or a general election; but our Government is so organized that the primary must be directed by the State, while the Federal Government has ample power to protect its elections for Federal officers against this baleful influence.

Mr. BURTON. One further suggestion. If the right to control the primaries is not granted, must it not be conceded that in any State or district where one party is overwhelmingly in the majority this statute would be absolutely ineffective?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, that is true, assuming that the State itself had no concern for the purity of the ballot. If there is a State in the Union indifferent to the worthy purpose which this bill is intended to advance, then the condition suggested by the Senator from Ohio is undoubtedly true, however unfortunate it may be.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Texas know how many of the States in which the primary practically selects the candidate for Senator have effective laws of the kind that is now proposed?

Mr. BAILEY. I am not able to answer that question with such accuracy that would justify me in attempting to answer it at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand the Senator from Texas to express some doubt as to whether or not Congress would have the power to supervise the registration of voters.

Mr. BAILEY. Not to supervise the registration, but provide for registration. I mean to say that in a State which requires registration as a condition precedent to voting, undoubtedly Congress would have a right to provide for the appointment of registrars to see that only those qualified under the law of the State to vote actually voted; but for a State which has no registration law, I do not believe Congress would have the right to pass one——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress in this bill is not undertaking to provide that primary elections shall be held, but it is only undertaking to supervise them to the extent that the bill provides in case there are primary elections.

Mr. BAILEY. I fully understand that; but the Senator from Utah will not differ with me in thinking that if you have the right to supervise them you have the right to order them and control them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may be correct about that; but what I was going to suggest to the Senator was that if Congress had the power to supervise the registration of voters, which constitutes merely a preliminary step to the election itself, upon what theory may it not supervise the primary elections?

Mr. BAILEY. That is substantially the same question which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] asked me. The difference is this: The Constitution of the United States expressly authorizes Congress to regulate the times, places, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives in Congress, but there is no suggestion in any clause of the Constitution that Congress has the power to regulate the party processes by which its candidates are nominated. If it possesses the power at all, it must derive it from the other power to control the election. If it has the power to supervise a primary election, it would have the power to supervise a convention. Assert that power, and then you not only may be confronted with contests involving the validity and fairness and result of your elections, but you must go one step further down into the States and inquire into the fairness and result of its primaries.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Under the general power of the Constitution, which the Senator from Texas has just quoted, we are undertaking to supervise the expenditure of money in an election. The expenditure of money is merely incidental; it is neither the time, place, nor manner, but it is purely incidental to the election. Is it not true that the money spent in the primaries is just as incidental to that election as the other?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; there are a thousand nominations to be made which will never eventuate in an election. It is not incidental at all. I am afraid a Democratic nomination in Massachusetts will not be so near an election at times as I would wish it to be.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me, as the Senator I have no doubt is well aware from observation, that the primaries have added to the election expenses. In many cases the whole expense is in the primaries. So far as my observation has gone, I think more money is spent in the primaries in getting out voters than is spent for the general election. It seems to me impossible to disassociate the final result from the money spent in that way. All of us want to get to that expenditure of money and have it properly returned. In my State we have now, and have had for many years, a very rigid corrupt-practices act, as it is called, which covers both the primaries and the elections; and if we are going to reach campaign expenditures for national offices it is going to be essential in some way to have returns of the expenditures at the primaries as well as at the elections.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there is no rule of constitutional construction known to the books—I will withdraw that, and will say there is no rule of constitutional construction known to me—under which you can read into the Constitution a power to supervise the action of political parties as either a supplement or an incident to the power of Congress to supervise a general election.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The Constitution now provides that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the qualifications and elections of its Members. Now, conceding that there is no other provision of the Constitution under which this character of legislation might be enacted, is it not true that for the purpose of determining that question the Congress itself may provide the means by which it may determine whether or not its Members have been legally elected?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly Congress can determine whether its Members have been legally elected, but it can not determine whether they have been fairly nominated.

Mr. WORKS. That is one of the steps, if the Senator will allow me, necessary under the primary law by which the election may take place.

Mr. BAILEY. Not necessarily within the meaning of the Constitution, because when the Constitution was written and when it was adopted no such practice was known.

Mr. WORKS. Then, if that be true, any State can evade the Constitution by providing practically for the election of Senators at a primary election.

Mr. BAILEY. They do it now; and that is one of the reasons, I will say to the Senator from California, that moved me to favor the joint resolution amending the Constitution with respect to the election of Senators. We have now all the evils, if there are any evils, of a direct election, without the finality——

Mr. WORKS. At all events, if this bill should pass as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, we would have one law applicable in one State not applicable in another, dependent upon the question whether one State or the other provided for a primary election.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, we have different laws in all the States to-day, and this bill will not reach those which have no direct primaries.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator understand that section 8, or the amendment, undertakes in any way to supervise primary elections in any State?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have not indicated that to be my opinion. What I am saying is that if we have the power to require publication with respect to the primary, the same as with respect to the general election, we assume the same power over the primary that we possess over the general election; and it has developed here that Senators on the other side all maintain that view.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator understand that section 8 undertakes to deal not with the election at all, but with the candidate who aspires to a seat in the House of Representatives or to a seat in the Senate, and does not the Senator believe that Congress has the right, each House being the judge of the qualifications of its own Members, to provide such evidence on that subject as it may see fit; in other words, to require a candidate who aspires to a seat in either of these bodies to file a statement as to how much it cost him to come here? That is all that is provided for in section 8. It simply requires a candidate to file a statement as to how much it cost him to get here in case he is successful, and that would be a dead letter if it applied only to the general election in those States or in those districts where a nomination is equivalent to an election. It was the purpose of the committee, I think, simply to deal with the candidates who sought places in either of these bodies. It assumed the power to require them to file statements as to their expenditures. That is as far as section 8 goes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I perfectly understand that this amendment does not go to the extent which I have been indicating; but my argument has been that, as desirable as it is—and I think it is desirable—it assumes a power in Congress which Congress does not possess. It assumes that Congress has the same jurisdiction over a primary election that it has over a general election, and I am unable to assent to that proposition.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire to enter with any degree of thoroughness into the argument, but I want to say to the Senator that, while I have the utmost confidence in his ability, I entirely differ from him on that subject. I do not think that to require this statement to be made involves the recognition of the power to control or regulate primary elections.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if I could agree with the Senator from Georgia in that respect I would resume my seat and vote for the amendment; but if we have any power at all over primary elections, we have a plenary power.

Mr. BACON. The amendment does not give us any power over them.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Georgia could persuade me of that, we would have an end of the argument; but the Senator from Georgia has not, of course, failed to observe that every Republican Senator who has made a suggestion with respect to the matter maintains a different view. They maintain that the primary, to borrow the language of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], is merely incidental to the general election.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I am not altogether surprised that Republican Senators should take that view, but I myself utterly differ from that view. I do not think it involves any question of the power over primaries. It simply involves, in my opinion, what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has indicated—the right of the Congress of the United States to make such regulations as will enable it when a Senator presents himself here, or a Representative in the other House presents himself there, to determine whether or not that man has been elected by corruption, whether there has been corrupt use of money in his election; and how in any manner that involves the question of the control of the primaries I am at a loss to see.

Mr. BAILEY. To insist that we have a right to inquire into the corruption of the primaries concedes our control over them——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Because if you can inquire into the corruption, then undoubtedly you have a right to prevent the corruption.

Mr. BACON. Not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. Which this is an attempt to do.

Mr. BACON. I do not follow the Senator to that conclusion by any means, that Congress has the right to prevent the corruption in a primary election. You have the right to prevent a Senator from taking a seat here if he has procured it by corruption. But it does not include the right to go into the State and prevent improper acts in a primary election. The Senate has the jurisdiction over the Senator when he comes here to the extent that it may inquire into the question of corrupt practices, if they existed, by which he came here; but the Senate has no jurisdiction to control the manner in which a primary election shall be held.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, that proceeds upon the theory that he was not elected, and under our power to judge of the returns, qualifications, and elections, we possess that power.

Mr. BACON. I do not even go to that extent, although I know the Senator can find authorities upon which to base that contention. I do not think the fact that we reject a Senator here on the ground that corruption has been used in his election involves the fundamental proposition that he has not been elected. I think we have a right to reject any Senator for any reason we in good faith think proper, and the fact that bribery has been employed is a sufficient reason.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator mean to say that, if I present myself here from the State of Texas, with a certificate under the great seal of that State, it being admitted that I was chosen by the legislature, that I was fairly chosen——

Mr. BACON. Yes——

Mr. BAILEY. That I possess the qualifications of age, citizenship, and residence prescribed in the Constitution, the Senate could for any reason it thought fit exclude me?

Mr. BACON. Under certain circumstances, if it was a matter which involved the question of the bribery of the electors.

Mr. BAILEY. I am waiving that.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator let me answer the question he has asked me?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but that is not my question, if the Senator will permit me. I did not say for bribery. I said for any reason. I understood the Senator to say that the Senate could set a Senator aside for any reason——

Mr. BACON. I was going on to say, and I still say so, but the Senator would not permit me to finish my sentence—I was proceeding to say that there are certain things which could be alleged against a Senator which would vacate his seat and only a majority vote would be required to unseat him. I care not what his credentials are, if after he has come to this body and has secured his seat, things are developed which in the opinion of the Senate render that man unfit to sit here, by a two-thirds vote he could be excluded.

Mr. BAILEY. Not excluded, but expelled.

Mr. BACON. Expelled; it is the same thing.

Mr. BAILEY. Very different, both in law and fact.

Mr. BACON. I will not——

Mr. BAILEY. You exclude a man not legally elected, by a majority; you expel him by two-thirds for misconduct.

Mr. BACON. I will accept the correction of the Senator, although I do not think the differentiation is important. When I said "excluded," I meant "expelled." I was probably unfortunate in the use of language, and I was trying to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, in my judgment, there are some things which can be dealt with in the Senate by a majority vote. For instance, if it can be shown that a Senator was elected by votes which were corrupted and without which he could not have been elected, that will vacate his seat and he can be turned out by a majority vote. If, on the contrary, it can be shown that he was overwhelmingly elected and that he had bribed one man, we would expel him by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no. That vacates his election, according to all authorities.

Mr. BACON. That may be, but still, if it were not so, we could still expel him. I am simply illustrating the point that the Senator suggested—that when a man has presented himself here and has been accorded his seat, he could not thereafter be dealt with without declaring his seat vacant. We can recognize the right of the Senator to sit here and still expel him because, in our judgment, he is unfit to sit here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Georgia answers one suggestion and then he raises another question. The inquiry I submitted to him was as to the power of the Senate to pass upon the returns, the qualifications, and the elections of our Members. I never was more satisfied of anything in my life than I am that the qualifications are limited to age, citizenship, and residence.

Mr. BACON. As prescribed in the Constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. As prescribed in the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. BAILEY. And a Senator who presents himself, chosen at an election about which there is no question of its fairness, regularity, or result, and who possesses the constitutional qualifications, must be admitted. The Senate has no power, except that power which answers to nobody, to set him aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Texas permit a suggestion by way of supposition?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Children, in order to clarify the atmosphere in an argument, frequently suppose a case. Suppose that in a given case it could be shown that there had been great corruption in the party primary, and suppose in the same case it was shown that at the general election there was no corruption of any sort, that the man was clearly and overwhelmingly and honestly elected; could the Senate go back of the general election to the primary which had been corrupt?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think it could. The Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Georgia only within the last few days were not willing to vest Congress with the power to go into the general election to do it, and I strongly sympathized with their feeling in the matter.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me for just a moment? When this bill was reported yesterday by the Committee on Privileges and Elections it was not supposed that it would be taken up as quickly as has been done. When the motion was made to take it up, eight members of that committee were engaged, under the order of the Senate, in conducting the investigation of the election of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], which they suspended in order to come in and answer to the roll call on that motion.

For reasons which seem to us important the members of the committee are obliged to return at 2 o'clock, and before going I want to make a statement for the committee, not having had an opportunity to do so before.

In reporting this measure the committee had in mind the fact that the movement to make public the campaign expenditures of different political parties is not entirely a new one. In 1907 we adopted a law forbidding national banks and other corporations deriving their powers from the National Government to make campaign contributions——

Mr. BAILEY. I supported it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; of course.

Mr. BAILEY. It was reported on my motion.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Prohibiting corporations, of whatever nature, from making contributions to what may be briefly termed national elections.

Mr. BAILEY. That was reported on my motion.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes. In 1910, in furtherance of the same idea and for the purpose of discouraging large contributions by making public the source from which they came, Congress passed a law requiring reports or statements from political committees to be made within 30 days after such election.

The main feature of the pending House bill is to amend the law of 1910 by requiring reports to be made before the election as well as after, not more than 15 days nor less than 10 days before the election as well as 30 days after, as now provided.

The committee have reported favorably upon that proposition, believing that the country demands the fullest light in relation to the extent of political contributions, the sources from which they come, and the disposition which is made of them. But it seemed to them, in order to make the measure absolutely complete, that it should not stop with national committees or other committees engaged in influencing national elections, but that it should cover the expenditures made by the candidates themselves if they were candidates either for membership in the House of Representatives or the Senate of the United States.

In the proposed new section 8 they have simply extended the same principle and made it apply to candidates as well as committees—the principle upon which was based the provisions already in the law relating to the duties of political committees.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is right.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes. Now we have carefully avoided, we have avoided just as far as we possibly can, using any phraseology in this bill implying the right of Congress to go further than that in the control of the election of Federal officers in the various States.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you mean elections or nominations?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Nominations or primaries of any character.

We understand that in certain States the primaries control, in effect, the election of Senators. In other cases candidates go before conventions and secure the indorsement of the convention, which is intended to control the election in the legislature of the State.

There is no attempt in this bill to require anything—I mean under section 8—but a statement from candidates, either for the House of Representatives or the Senate of the United States, of all moneys they have received and expended in pursuance of their own election. That is the purpose of the proposed amendment.

Mr. BACON. Does it include the presidential electors also?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It does not. Section 8 only relates to candidates for either one branch or the other of Congress.

Mr. BACON. Is there another provision in the bill which relates to presidential electors?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; there is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to say, in addition to what the chairman of the committee so well said, that we were confronted with the desire to have the widest publicity in all these matters; and I confess that when section 8 was before the committee I expressed my doubts then as to the authority of Congress to enact such a law. I expressly reserved the right to vote against this amendment—that part of the amendment—but at the same time I wanted to accomplish the purpose of the amendment, if possible.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Alabama aptly describes my state of mind. I want to do everything that can lawfully be done. But I have never yet seen any good purpose that could be served by either violating or stretching the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But if the Senator from Texas please, just a word further. I think a majority of the committee held to the opinion that Congress has the same power to compel a person seeking a seat in either body to make public the means—that is, the financial means—through which his candidacy has been furthered that it has to compel any political committee which may be supporting him to make public the receipts and expenditures by such committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly agree to that when confined to the election.

But here is my trouble: You assume a power to go one step beyond where the Constitution authorizes you to go. The Constitution authorizes Congress to regulate the election, but you assume the right to go down into the primary, and you would have the same right to superintend a convention that you would have in a primary election.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But, if the Senator please, this bill does not go either into the primary or election or attempt to control anything in connection with either, but simply to make public how much money has been expended and from what source that money was received and to what persons the money was paid.

Mr. BAILEY. But, Mr. President, that is begging the question which I have raised. The question which I have raised here is, Has Congress the power to do with respect to the primaries the same things it may do with respect to a general election? Does the Senator from Vermont assert that power in Congress?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. A majority of the committee, I will say, had no doubt, I think, as to the power of Congress to require such returns to be made as this bill requires of the candidates either for the House of Representatives or the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator go one step further and answer my question, which is, Does Congress possess the same power to regulate the primary elections that it does to regulate the general elections?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That question is so broad, because the primary system varies so in the various States, that I would not hazard an opinion upon it. The committee, as I said before, did not look upon this measure as one intended to enter into the control or the management or even the supervision of those elections. But they did intend to require of those who presented themselves for seats in either branch of Congress a statement made to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, of the amount of money expended by them in pursuance of their candidacy, from what sources it was received, and to what persons it was paid.

Mr. BAILEY. There is not a Senator here who more cordially approves than I do every lawful effort to prevent the use of money in elections; but I care not what the purpose to be served is, it is not wise unless it can be lawfully and constitutionally served.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the learned Senator whether he recognizes the difference between a requirement of a candidate to state the means used by him in his election and the exercise of the power to control the primary election in which he was a candidate?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, except for our authority to regulate the times, places, and manner of the election, we would have no power to pass this bill, and consequently for the purpose of determining the power there is no difference, I answer the Senator.

Mr. BACON. The question I asked the Senator was preliminary to one which he has already answered and which I intended to ask him, and that was this:

Upon what clause of the Constitution does the Senator base the contention for the right of Congress to require this information of a candidate in a regular election? The Senator has just said he based it upon the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the right to prescribe the times, places, and manner of the election of Senators and Representatives.

Now I utterly and entirely differ with the learned Senator in that conclusion. I do not think the power is found there at all, because this is in no manner a regulation of the times, places, or manner of the election. It is simply requiring of a Senator when he comes here information upon which the Senate may determine whether that man is entitled to his seat or whether he shall be allowed to retain his seat even if he was originally properly seated—that is, if he had the proper credentials, the three essentials of which the Senator has enumerated—and in my judgment the right to exact of one elected, claiming a seat in this body or in the other House, this information, is not based upon the fourth clause of the first article of the Constitution, but based exclusively upon the right of the Senate to inquire into the returns and qualification of its Members. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it distresses me to see a Democrat like the Senator from Georgia undertaking to find a new provision for the exercise of an old power. I venture to say, without having examined the record, that he is now asserting for the first time that our power to pass a corrupt practice act rests upon that provision in the Constitution. The power of the State does not rest there. The power of the General Government can not be made to rest there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will suspend for a moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope some one in charge of the bill will ask to lay it aside for a moment, because I am going——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has a perfect right to continue to occupy the floor, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. I know, but I want this measure disposed of. The Senator from Vermont, who is the chairman of the committee which reported this bill, is holding a session of another committee, which he must attend.

Mr. BURTON. I hope the pending measure will not be disposed of to-day. I am as heartily in favor of it as anyone here, and I would desire to add to it rather than detract from it, but it is quite unusual to bring up a measure like this for consideration and final disposition which has not been printed, either the report or the bill, until this morning. I think very likely I may desire to present some amendments to the bill.

Mr. BACON and Mr. CULBERSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield, and to whom?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CULBERSON. Inasmuch as the bill was taken up on my motion, having been reached on the calendar under Rule VIII, I desire to say that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the chairman of the committee, advises me that after 2 o'clock he will be specially engaged, and he desires to be present when this bill is considered. I have no objection, of course——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been already laid aside, the unfinished business now being before the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Vermont, however, that the bill ought to be reprinted, so as to be correctly printed. It was reported on the 19th of June, although it passed the House on the 14th of April, and it is incorrectly printed. I invite his attention to that, so that it may be corrected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary advises the Chair that it has already been ordered reprinted with the corrections, during the absence of the present occupant of the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator from Vermont, who is chairman of the committee and who has a right to be present when this matter is discussed, must now absent himself upon some other business of the Senate, and I desist.

Mr. BACON. Before the bill is laid aside I simply desire to say to my distinguished friend from Texas that I hope in the interval his examination may cause him less distress as to my peculiar view in regard to this constitutional function than he is now agitated by.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Georgia will find me any authority for that peculiar view, and I say peculiar with all deference, I will be very glad to withdraw my opposition, because if there is an authority in Congress to adopt this amendment I earnestly desire to vote for it. I am constrained only by the belief that we are without the power to legislate on this subject.

Mr. President, I know how thankless a task it is to interpose these general suggestions of the want of power against any bill which has a popular support. I suppose I desire to agree with the public as much as any Senator. Though I think I do not yield as readily as some Senators, I am certainly as desirous as any Senator ought to be to agree with the public. I know that there is a universal demand for legislation that shall suppress the use of money in our elections. But until I change my opinion as to the relations between the General Government and the States I must insist that a large part of the good which needs to be done must be left for the States to do. Because I would stand here and oppose a Federal law to punish murder in a State it can not be made the basis of a suggestion that I do not abhor murder and that I would not punish it. But that, according to my doctrine, like nearly all of the other misconduct of this life, is committed not only by the Constitution but by our general scheme of government to the States of this Union, not to the Federal Government.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say that I do not rest with entire acquiescence in the suggestion of the Senator that those who differ from him in this particular are influenced by a disregard in any manner of constitutional obligations or limitations and are controlled in any manner by what may be considered a popular desire.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not apply that to himself, for nothing was further from my mind than to make that suggestion with reference to him.

Mr. BACON. Well, the Senator had claimed the virtue for himself that he was opposing it.

Mr. BAILEY. But I will never deny to the Senator from Georgia what I claim for myself.

Mr. BACON. I do not suppose that the Senator does. I simply wish to say that I base my opinion upon what I conceive to be the correct constitutional construction, and I will not go as far as the distinguished gentleman to say that his view is a peculiar view. I think possibly, as it may be viewed in the long run, the one may not be any more peculiar than the other.

I myself regret that I am unable to express in a way to carry full appreciation the view I have, but there is a wide difference between judging of the means by which a Senator or a Representative secured his seat and the question of the control of the machinery of an election, either the regular election or a primary.

I think the two are entirely different. I repeat that I think the power to judge of the regularity of a regular election is under the fourth clause of the first article of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the power to judge of the times, places, and manner of elections; and I am still very strongly of the opinion that the right to require a candidate in a regular election to disclose the means used by him to secure his election, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he has made an undue or an improper or a corrupt use of money, is under the clause which I have cited, which gives to Congress the right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members. I do not think the Senate, when it comes to consider the question of personal fitness of one to be a Senator, is limited to the three qualifications of age, citizenship, and residence. The Senate may for any reason exclude a man whom they in good faith think personally unworthy to sit here. That is a broad power, which has no limitations to it.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senate can exclude a man even for the reason that they do not think him worthy of a seat.

Mr. BACON. In my opinion the Senate can rightfully exclude any man whom they think unworthy to sit in this body, I care not how regular his election may have been. For a reason that the Senate shall honestly believe to be sufficient to make a man unworthy to sit in this body the Senate has the right and the rightful power to exclude him. Of course, it is a power which ought to be very carefully guarded and very rarely exercised.

Without detaining the Senate on it, I simply desire to say that recognizing the fact, which we do and must do, that in a great many jurisdictions the primary election is the election and the regular election thereafter is a matter of form, I think that the question as to the propriety of a man's conduct in that primary election is a matter which it is important we should have the opportunity to know about, and I do not think it is in any manner an infringement of the Constitution. For myself, I would desire to see the law embrace the question of expenses in that preliminary election, which, at least in some localities, is the conclusive election.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. There is a test of this matter. Does the Senator from Georgia contend that under our power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of a Senator we could go beyond the legislature and inquire concerning the election of its members?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not by any means.

Mr. BAILEY. And yet the election of members to the legislature is more inseparably connected with the election of a Senator than a primary election.

Mr. BACON. That is doing the very thing which I say we have no power to do. That would be going into the question of the manner of an election of a member of the legislature. I say the right to inquire into the conduct of a candidate in a primary election does not depend upon that part of the Constitution at all.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me take the Senator's own suggestion. Suppose that the most upright Senator in this body—I will not use that expression because there must be no distinction of that kind—but suppose any Senator in this body was elected by two votes, and I could prove that three men elected to that legislature were nominated by fraud and corruption——

Mr. BACON. Of course, we could not go behind that.

Mr. BAILEY. We can not go behind that.

Mr. BACON. Of course not.

Mr. BAILEY. We can not in the exercise of our power which the Senator well says is great, though I can not concur with him in thinking it is so great that it is subject to no limitation, except our own conscience. I think we are limited by certain rules, but that is immaterial in this connection. Asserting the power to be as great as I think it is, and much more if it as great as the Senator thinks it is, when we come to judge of the returns, qualifications, and elections of our Members, the very power under which he says this is to be exercised, he agrees with me that we have no power to go beyond the legislature and look into the election of its members.

I agree with him, and that has been the uniform judgment of the Senate. I then say that, under that same power, we have no right to go down beyond the general election and inquire into the primary.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator's logic is not as good as it usually is. The question between us is whether or not the right to exact certain information of a candidate, or one who has been a candidate and who claims an election, carries with it the right to control and judge of what occurred in the primary election so far as the electors are concerned.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I beg that the Senator will let me answer the Senator from Texas first; then I will with pleasure yield to the Senator.

I contend that that can not be done. The Senator contends that if the information can be exacted, it can be done; and as a proof that the Senator is right he then illustrates by the case of the regular election and says that we can not inquire into the sufficiency of the election of the electors, to wit, the legislature, and therefore we can not inquire as to the manner of the primary election.

I entirely agree with him. We can not inquire as to the manner of the primary election. What the Senator puts as an illustration simply proves the contention which I make—that we can not inquire. There is no legal power in Congress to inquire into the primary election, just in the same way as there would be no legal power in Congress to inquire into the election of a man who as a member of the legislature was chosen as an elector of a Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will allow me one moment, I will finish.

Mr. BAILEY. We are near coming to an agreement now.

Mr. BACON. I think not, unless the Senator is coming over to my side.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me see.

Mr. BACON. Let me finish what I was going to say. To illustrate what I meant, the Senator put one case where the Congress would not have the right to go behind the electors, to wit, the legislature.

Mr. BAILEY. Well——

Mr. BACON. I can suggest another case where you can go behind the election of a Senator by the legislature or behind the election of a Representative by the people. Suppose after a Senator has taken his seat it should be shown that he was a bank embezzler prior to that time, or that he was a murderer, or had committed the most heinous of all crimes, does the Senator say we could not, because that occurred prior to the election, exclude him from this body?

Mr. BAILEY. We could do it.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Because there is no power to restrain us; but we could not lawfully do it.

Mr. BACON. I do not agree with the Senator. I do think we could.

Mr. BAILEY. I think all questions of misconduct are settled by the people when they elect him.

Mr. BACON. In my opinion, not by any means.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator will permit me to ask him this question: He says that it is under our power to judge the qualifications of a Member of this body. This bill not only requires the information of the man who is nominated and elected, but it requires it of the man who is defeated as well, and surely we have no power over him under our power of judging of qualifications.

Mr. BACON. I will yield that part to the Senator. I am not contending as to the man who is defeated. I yield that to the Senator, but I do not put it where the Senator does. If I put it under the fourth clause of the first article, I would not yield it, because it would cover it as well as the other, but I do not think it rests under the fourth clause of the first article; it rests under the other, which I have mentioned, which gives plenary power to this body to judge of the fitness of a man to sit in this body.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator does agree that the only difference between him and me now is merely as to the power to require this information, and he fully agrees with me that we have no power to go beyond that and control the election.

Mr. BACON. I am inclined to think the Senator would be entirely right about that.

Mr. BAILEY. The difference then between the Senator——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BACON. Very well; I will yield to the Senator from Washington, if he desires.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just on the particular proposition laid down by the Senator from Texas, in which I understand the Senator from Georgia concurs, that the Senate would have no right to go back of the election of members of the legislature, suppose it should be shown that a Senator presenting credentials had, by the use of money, procured the election of members of the legislature, does the Senator mean to contend that it would not be within the power of the Senate to hold his election by the legislature, secured by corruption, invalid?

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator address that question to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was addressing it to the Senator from Texas. I understand, however, that both Senators concur in the same view.

Mr. BAILEY. I was trying to analyze the answer of the Senator from Georgia, and I owe the Senator from Washington an apology for not attending closely to what he said. I was looking at him but I was not thinking of his question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have the view of the Senator from Georgia on that point.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say I would be very much pleased to know the views of the Senator from Georgia upon that proposition.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Washington means to ask me whether we could determine the invalidity of the election of members of the legislature, and therefore that the Senator was not duly elected if he received those votes, and they were requisite to him, I should say undoubtedly no, because that would have to rest necessarily under the assumed power of the fourth clause of the first article. But if the Senator goes further and asks whether or not we could deal with that Senator when he came here and exclude him on the ground that he had bribed or secured the election of members of the legislature who afterwards elected him and thereby secured his election, I should say yes, we could exclude him for that reason, because he had rendered himself unfit to be a member of this body. I should put it under the same clause of the Constitution, which my learned friend says is a peculiar view of it.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think that it is peculiar to judge a man's qualifications under that clause. I only think it is peculiar to regulate the elections under it. Undoubtedly the effort to disclose the amount of money used is an effort not to fix the qualification of Senators and Representatives, but it is an effort to purge all elections of the use improperly of money.

The Senator might take it this way. I can conceive a state of case in which a Senator might spend $250,000 and not spend a dollar of it corruptly. The Senator can easily imagine that.

Mr. BACON. That would not disqualify him in any way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator permit me there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has yielded to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I was only going to say that does not touch his qualification. Now, if I had my way, no man living would be permitted to spend that amount, or a fraction of it, in any election. I would prevent the use of money, honestly or dishonestly, because the honest use of money is a curse to the politics of any State or nation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the Senator says that he is opposed to doing it by this measure because we have no constitutional authority to act, notwithstanding the Senator would be in favor of the bill if we had the constitutional power.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to vote for the bill. I am simply going to vote against the amendment to the bill; and in that I am following the overwhelming majority of the Democrats of the House, if it be proper to refer to that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator concedes that bribery in the election of members of the legislature in a general election, which legislature is to elect a Senator, would invalidate his election, or is a subject about which Congress could legislate, what substantial difference is there under the Constitution if the candidate for the United States Senate should bribe or corrupt the primary election for members of the legislature, which primary election absolutely determines the personnel of the legislature, which, when it is elected by the use of money in such way as is prohibited by the terms of this bill, controls the election of the candidate for the Senate and gives him a seat in this body?

Mr. BAILEY. That argument all comes back to the proposition that Congress possesses the same power over a primary that it does over a general election, because they are inseparable. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that a constitutional power never depends on a state of facts. The constitutional power, of course, must be exercised under a state of facts, but Congress is not clothed with the power to regulate the primary when it is equivalent to an election and not clothed with the power to regulate the primary when it is not equivalent to an election. The power must exist independently of what relation the primary bears to the general election. If it possesses that power at all, it possesses it when and where the primary is not equivalent to an election the same as it possesses it when and where the primary is equivalent to the general election.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is simply assuming, of course, basing his assumption upon the argument which he is making, that Congress has no power to regulate primary elections. The matters about which we are now inquiring bear upon the question as to whether or not Congress has power to regulate primary elections. It seems to me perfectly obvious—and there is no escape from it in common sense and in law—that the corruption of the election of members of the legislatures during the election and before the election for the purpose of controlling their votes for a United States Senator is equivalent in all respects—morally, legally, and constitutionally—to their corruption after the election, because it has the same effect, for the same purpose, and the Constitution is framed to reach the effect and the purpose and can not be limited by finely drawn and immaterial distinctions as to whether the act is done at one time or another time.

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; the time as well as the place where men do a given act frequently determines its criminality or its innocence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; there are statutes of limitation and there are rules as to venue, but neither of those applies to this case.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I do not refer to that. I mean that the same act committed at one time or at one place might be entirely innocent, and if committed at another place it might be an offense against the law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in order that I may yield the floor I simply desire to say in conclusion of all that I have to say that if I agreed with the Senator from Texas that this power is under the fourth section of the first article I would undoubtedly agree with his conclusion. But I do not agree to that.

Mr. BAILEY. And I will agree with the Senator from Georgia thoroughly that if this amendment can be referred to the clause to which he refers——

Mr. BACON. To the fifth.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. If he is right in predicating this amendment on that particular clause, then I would go with him. I assume that if I am right in the other position, he would join with me.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly. I only claim that under the fourth clause of that first article there could not possibly be any exercise of power by Congress to regulate the times, places, and manner of a primary election.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no very great difference in principle between the Senator from Georgia and myself, then.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to make one suggestion in connection with the inquiry which I just made. Assuming that the use of money in an election of members of the legislature by a candidate for the United States Senate is a proper subject of regulation by Congress, because it determines his election and secures his election by corrupt means in the legislature, what difference is there in its effect upon the result—and that is, What is to be controlled by Congress, what is reached by the Constitution between that and the use of money in corrupt practices of various kinds which are proposed to be reached by this act to enable the candidate himself to get before the legislature as a candidate? By one means he secures a legislature favorable to his election to the United States Senate. By the other means he secures the possibility of his appearing before the legislature as a candidate, with the corrupt use of money. We are assuming, of course, a violation of the law. As the Senator has just said, which of course is true, a man might expend money in a perfectly legitimate way. No one would contend that it would invalidate the election; but it is the contrary assumption which is material in considering this act. If he should expend a large amount of money in support of his own candidacy to bring himself as a candidate before the legislature, I submit to the Senator from Texas that the effect of it is just the same as though he expended the money to corrupt the legislature.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Washington a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina for that purpose?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Senators in some States are nominated by the State convention of their party, and the nomination is equivalent to an election. Has the Senate a right to inquire into the methods of the nomination of such a Senator in a State convention?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly they have a right so to do. I would not contend that Congress would have a right to enact a corrupt practices act such as this to reach the corruption of a convention; but I do contend that this Senate, under its power to judge of the election, qualifications, privileges, and return of its Members, if it is shown to the Senate that a candidate has secured his nomination, which is equivalent to an election, by corruption, would have the power to declare his title to his seat invalid on that account.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, I will make a very brief and a very simple answer to the question which the Senator from Washington has propounded to me. That answer is that when bribery is practiced in the election of members of the State legislature the crime is committed against the State; the State ought to punish it; the State can punish it; and if the State does not punish it, it can not confer the power upon us to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one word further, if the Senator will yield to me.

Mr. BAILEY. And I utterly deny that the Senate of the United States can go down into the State legislature and inquire into the qualifications and return of its members.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one word in that connection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas further yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The contention of the Senator from Texas, it seems to me, is parallel to the contention that was made in the election case recently considered by the Senate. The contention was made, at least by one Senator on the committee, that the Senate ought not to inquire into certain matters in connection with that election, because the State had inquired into them; in other words, one man had been put upon trial and acquitted by a jury, and another man had been a candidate for reelection to the legislature and had been reelected. Does the Senator concur in the view that because the State has ignored the corruption of its legislature, this body ought to ignore it and accept as conclusive the action of the inferior officers of the State?

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator meant that it went to the weight of the evidence rather than to its admissiblity, but I have no right to say what was in his mind.

Mr. President, I feel that I owe the Senate an apology for having detained it with this matter so long, and I owe it the greater apology because I have been arguing upon a doubt rather than a conviction, and it may be that when I have a further opportunity to examine the question I shall agree to what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] expresses as his view; but it is absolutely certain that I shall never agree that the Congress of the United States, under its power to regulate the times, places, and manner of elections, has the power to go into our States and regulate the conduct of our primaries.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe the unfinished business has been laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was called out yesterday while Senators were still discussing the question of the paper section as affecting the favored-nation clause of our treaties. I regretted very much that I should have been called away, because I wanted to hear what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] had begun to say on that subject. I was unable to return for some time, and the Senate had then passed to another phase of the question. I wish now merely to repeat the suggestion I then made a little more fully than I was able to do yesterday, when there were many interruptions, and I was drawn off to other points.

I was very far from laying down dogmatically the proposition that the House bill as it stood in section 2 involved an infringement of the favored-nation clause, but it has been suggested to me by such consideration as I have given the subject that it is open to that objection. I am perfectly aware, of course, that the removal of export duties or other similar restrictions in the ordinary case is an equivalent for the admission of the article. Taking, for example, the existing law, you will find there are similar provisions in regard to importations of wood pulp and paper. Those provisions contain, it is true, a retaliatory feature. Of course it has never been suggested by anyone that I am aware of that a retaliatory duty imposed on account of a bounty or an export duty by the other country and conditioned on that bounty or export duty was, if removed, in the nature of reciprocity.

Mr. BACON. Because that is not a consideration.

Mr. LODGE. No; I never heard it suggested. It is true that these provisions of the tariff law of 1909 have in them the retaliatory feature, but at the same time they are good examples of the ordinary form of provisions similar to this one. It is the distinction between this now before us and the others which I wish to point out. The existing tariff law of 1909, for instance, in regard to print paper says:

> Provided, however, That if any country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government shall forbid or restrict in any way the exportation of (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) or impose any export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise) upon printing paper, wood pulp, or wood for use in the manufacture of wood pulp, there shall be imposed upon printing paper when imported either directly or indirectly from such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, an additional duty of one-tenth of 1 cent per pound.

That is a retaliatory duty, of course; but what I want to call attention to is the fact that that is made dependent on the law of the country and not on the material itself; that is, if there is material that does not bear the bounty or the export duty, it is no more capable of coming in here free than that which does bear the duty, because the condition is that the country shall put on no restrictive duties or export duties or bounties of any kind. When you take the clause in this bill, you observe at once the distinction between this and the ordinary clause. It does not apply to the action of the country; it does not say that all print paper shall come in when these restrictions are removed, but that all print paper or the material of which print paper is made shall come in free, provided such print paper and material do not bear those duties or bounties. If there is a certain wood on which no export duty can be placed, that can come in, although the other wood on which there is an export duty can not come in. It makes the distinction on the actual material used in the article presented at the border and not on the laws of the country or Province.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I agree with the construction of the Senator from Massachusetts, which is that under the word "such"—and I make the statement in order to ask a question—as the phraseology reads there, to put a concrete case, if I or the Senator from Massachusetts own a section of spruce timber land, under this bill the paper made from that spruce timber could come in absolutely free.

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably.

Mr. NELSON. Without any restriction; and so under this bill there would be no reciprocity.

Mr. LODGE. No; there would be no equivalent for it, ostensible or otherwise.

Mr. NELSON. Here is the question I am coming to, if the Senator will listen to me, which is, that being the case, does it come within the purview of the reciprocity agreement as negotiated or is it not a step outside of it? That is the point.

Mr. LODGE. I am coming to that in one moment.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I will state my contention briefly, and if he thinks with me I should like to have him explain it. My contention is that to the extent I have stated it is outside of the purview of the reciprocity agreement that was made between our State Department and the Canadian commissioners.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with that proposition. The agreement was drawn in that way, Mr. President, of course, with a purpose. The language is unusual in articles of that kind. It is drawn so as to separate the print paper and wood pulp made from wood grown on private lands, over which the Provinces have no control, from the wood pulp and the paper made from wood grown on the Crown lands, to which all restrictions and bounties apply. It is quite true that on the best estimate only one-tenth of the supply of pulp wood is to be found on private lands and that nine-tenths of it are on the public lands, and therefore nine-tenths are affected by this clause; but that one-tenth is not affected by this clause. That one-tenth comes in free at once, owing to those little words "such paper."

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator another question in connection with that? I do not wish to do so for the purpose of annoying the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. Not in the least.

Mr. NELSON. But for the purpose of getting at the truth of the matter. Such being the case, as the Senator and I have agreed, would not the enactment of that section amount to a tariff law under which we could not claim that it was reciprocal and that, therefore, the favored-nation clause would apply?

Mr. LODGE. That is the precise point for which I am contending. Now, Mr. President, you can apply the removal of the restrictions to the wood and pulp or paper, or whatever it is to which the restrictions relate, but you can not make the restrictions an equivalent for the wood to which they do not apply, unless you make the provision general, as usually is done in the law.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize, I presume, that this is an integral part of the bill, and I desire, in view of that fact, to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, the question of the various provisions of the bill being reciprocal is limited to the case of a reciprocity directly between two articles of the same kind?

Mr. LODGE. The bill is so framed throughout.

Mr. BACON. The Senator thinks that, under the peculiar framework of this bill——

Mr. LODGE. I not only think so, but I can demonstrate that fact by reading the bill; and the President's message shows the same thing.

Mr. BACON. The Senator thinks, from the peculiar framework of the bill, that the question as to the consideration for each concession made by the United States on the one hand or by the Dominion of Canada on the other depends exclusively upon the further question whether the concession in the one case is in consideration of a concession in the other case on exactly the same article?

Mr. LODGE. I have not any question as to that, and this provision is the only exception.

Mr. BACON. Now, the Senator puts the wood pulp and paper provision under the head of an exception, but that, of course, does not controvert the proposition that, as a general rule, all of the concessions on the one side are the considerations for the concessions on the other side.

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably.

Mr. BACON. And he thinks that in this particular case the proposition for which he contends rests upon the conclusion which he has reached that it is an exception to such general rule?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BACON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. LODGE. Because under the free list every article is balanced off against another. In another table we make identical duties on the same articles. In the third schedule—Schedule C in the message—a group of articles is balanced against another group of articles.

Mr. BACON. That may be.

Mr. LODGE. But this is not in that group; it is not in the list of articles with identical duties; it is not in the free list. Every article in the American free list is balanced against the same article in the Canadian free list, with the single exception of wood pulp and paper. Wood pulp and paper are in the free-list division. The bill runs perfectly even down to section 2. If you will turn back to page 19, where the Canadian list ends, you will find:

> Rolled round wire rods in the coil, of iron or steel, not over three-eighths of an inch in diameter, and not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge.

Where our list ends it ends in precisely the same way. I have no question that each is balanced against the other, but for the item of wood pulp and paper alone you find no balance.

Now, Mr. President, another thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. Let me finish the sentence. One other point. If you will turn to the statement of Mr. Fielding, which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had read on yesterday and which appears in the introduction to the President's message, you will see that Mr. Fielding, in stating his case, expressly refers to the second proviso of the agreement presented by the President as the equivalent for the arrangement which we propose as to wood pulp and paper going into Canada. He did not pretend that the first proviso contained an equivalent. Whether they considered the agreement final or not is no matter; he considered those two provisos as balancing each other, and he refers to them in that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. If additional articles were put upon the free list so far as their admission into the United States is concerned, and not put upon the free list so far as their admission into Canada is concerned, does the Senator from Massachusetts think that the reciprocal nature of the transaction would be destroyed?

Mr. LODGE. I have not the slightest question of it in a measure framed as this is.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then does the Senator believe that it is necessary that we should give Canada throughout precisely the same terms upon the same articles as Canada gives to us?

Mr. LODGE. Excepting Schedule C, where one group is set off against another.

Mr. CUMMINS. Ah, but I am asking the Senator as a general proposition.

Mr. LODGE. That schedule is not a free list.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a general proposition is it not possible for the United States to say to Canada, "We will give you free admission into the United States upon a long list of articles if you will give us free admission upon one article"?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; but that is not the agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking about the agreement, but I am speaking about the law. The Senator from Massachusetts is devoting himself to the law. Now, he seems to assume that, in order to escape the operation of the favored-nation clause, there must be an exact equivalent in every article.

Mr. LODGE. Where it is so framed, there must be.

Mr. CUMMINS. Who framed it?

Mr. LODGE. The negotiators.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it not now for Congress to frame this proposition?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The President had no power to frame this proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; he had.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under what authority?

Mr. LODGE. Under the treaty-making power—the power to negotiate with foreign nations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, at the proper time I intend to discuss that question. I insist that the President has no power to make any such proposition as this to Canada under the treaty-making power, and that it is here for us to make just such proposition to Canada as we think the welfare of the people of the United States demands; and I would be sorry——

Mr. LODGE. That is another proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be sorry indeed if the suggestion as to international law just made by the Senator from Massachusetts were to receive the approval of the Senate, because I think it is entirely repulsive to the whole practice of the Government as well as to the whole theory of reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. LODGE. I have not any doubt, Mr. President, of the power of Congress to amend this bill or to amend a reciprocity treaty, if negotiated, and to change it in any way they please; but I understood this measure to relate to making these clauses a part of the agreement with Canada. Whether that is done by Congress or by the President, if we put anything into that bill for which we have no equivalent and for which no equivalent can be produced, whether nominal or real, I think we open it to the favored-nation clause.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if I do not interrupt the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest one view to the Senator. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] completely answers the argument; that is, that it would be perfectly competent for the United States to enter into an agreement by proper legislation—I will not stop to discuss the question whether or not it could be done by treaty, and I do not think the pending agreement is under the exercise of the treaty-making power in any degree—it would be perfectly competent by legislation, if you please, to enter into an agreement in which, in consideration of the entry of one single article free into Canada, we would consent to the entry of a hundred articles into this country, and the consideration would be complete, although it might not be ample. Now, what I want to suggest to the Senator is this——

Mr. LODGE. That would be so if you would change the form of the measure.

Mr. BACON. I want to see whether it is so formed. Of course, the general proposition is that all of the concessions on the one side are the consideration for the concessions on the other; that is, all of them that are found in an agreement of this kind, whether or not that general rule is contravened in the particular section. The question I want to ask the Senator is this: Suppose the second section stopped after the word "duty," in line 19, and read in this way, with the remainder of the section stricken out:

After enumerating all the other articles which are involved in the several concessions of the United States on the one side and of Canada on the other, the second clause takes up the enumeration, if I may so speak, or the recitation, and uses this language:

SEC. 2. Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty—

Suppose it stopped right there and said nothing more.

Mr. LODGE. I think, of course, that would be obnoxious to the favored-nation clause.

Mr. BACON. I do not think there would be any other answer to that question than the one that has been given by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I shall have something more to say about it when I am allowed to proceed.

Mr. BACON. I do not question that.

Mr. LODGE. I yielded to the Senator, but I still have the floor, I believe; at least I have not taken my seat.

Mr. BACON. Very well, I will not pursue the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator for as long a time as he cares to go on. Then I will state why I answered the question as I did.

Mr. BACON. The proposition that I submit to the Senator is this: If the section ended with the word "duty," in line 19, upon what principle would that particular concession on the part of the United States be defended when the question came up whether or not there was a consideration for that concession? It would necessarily be defended upon the proposition that the remaining part of the agreement was the consideration for that concession. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: Does the fact that a condition precedent is attached to that particular concession in any manner change its nature except to say this——

Mr. LODGE. A condition does not affect it.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The effect of the condition is this——

Mr. LODGE. Except that the wording of the condition is drawing a distinction between two kinds of paper. That is all.

Mr. BACON. The effect of the condition is this: In the absence of the condition the Senator concedes that the consideration would be ample, or, rather, would be sufficient.

Mr. LODGE. No; I said it would be obnoxious. I said exactly the contrary.

Mr. BACON. Then, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator did not allow me time to finish.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I said it was obnoxious to the favored-nation clause.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I misunderstood the Senator, and with that misunderstanding our differences are very much enlarged, because I utterly differ from the Senator in that regard.

Mr. LODGE. I regret that, but I shall have to bear it as best I may.

Mr. BACON. I always do regret it whenever I differ with the Senator, but I have none the less confidence in the correctness of my view, that the concession in that particular would have a consideration found in the remaining portion of the agreement. I thought that proposition was so plain that we would not differ in regard to it; but if we do differ in regard to it, of course there is no chance to predicate an argument upon it. I had supposed that we had found there a common ground.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would make the matter rather clearer to cut it off there.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. Permit me to recur to the point that the Senator has just been discussing. This bill includes a reciprocal free list and a list of reciprocal reductions of duty. Then it has section 3. Now, as a practical question, I submit to the Senator whether the proposition that Canada admits a certain article free and the United States admits the same article free, and that the free admission by the one in the particular case is the only consideration for the free admission by the other, does not involve an economic solecism; that is to say, can the Senator conceive of commodities of the same kind and same quality going in commercial quantities through the customhouse at the same time in opposite ways? In the very nature of things, if this agreement is to be reciprocal, must not the consideration consist of all the concessions made on each side in exchange for all the concessions made on the other side? In practice there can be no reciprocity on the theory that precisely the same kind of an article will be going at the same time through the customhouse into Canada and coming through a near customhouse from Canada. It is true, with the long divisional line between the two countries, an article may be an import at one point and an export at another; but, relating to the same border point, does not the idea of reciprocity on each particular item involve a practical impossibility, a commercial absurdity? And in case the article placed upon the reciprocal free list or subjected to reciprocal reduction of duty is possible of production by only one of the parties to the agreement, what reciprocal consideration sustains the agreement as to such article?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, undoubtedly there would be nothing whatever in this point if this measure were framed as all our reciprocity treaties have been framed and as Schedule C is framed in the President's message, where Canada makes special duties on a certain group of articles and we make special duties on a certain group of articles, and neither the articles nor the duties correspond; they are set off, one group against another. But this bill is made up item by item, as set forth in the agreement made by the negotiations, and upon this bill and nothing else we are now voting. Typecasting and typesetting machines, for instance, are set off against typecasting and typesetting machines; and so all through. You can find nowhere in that bill any consideration for making pulp of wood, ground, and print paper free.

Mr. SHIVELY. On the theory of all the concessions on one side being the consideration for all the concessions on the other, is not the manner of statement in this bill the most convenient way to state the agreement?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly, if the bill was made in that way, this which I am pointing out would be of no importance. But it is not made that way. They carefully balance one thing against the other all the way down until they get to this article. Then they put it in a second section.

If the Senator will allow me, I will make a suggestion at this point for the benefit of those who have been thinking that there is no chance of the favored-nation clause applying, and which I have not heard them make themselves. Canada has put into her bill what was in the President's agreement submitted to Congress. That is, the provision for our paper going in under certain conditions. I do not think it is really of any economic value to us. But under certain conditions paper may go into Canada free. That is in the Canadian bill, although it is not in ours, and what makes me doubt whether this clause as it stands would be obnoxious to the favored-nation clause is the presence in the Canadian law of that clause, omitted from this bill as sent in by the President, because if the bill become law, it will be possible for us then, when the claim is made on the favored-nation clause—and it is going to be made by many countries under this bill—we can say that the compensation is in the Canadian act. I do not know that that would hold. I am not quite so absolutely sure about this matter as my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I have some doubt not only of his opinion but of my own, and I have very grave doubts about the views of other countries with which we have treaties. I suspect that they may not agree with the Senators who think that there is nothing in this point.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, if it is not disagreeable——

Mr. LODGE. Not in the least.

Mr. NELSON. I will call his attention to the fact that section 2 is utterly outside of the scope of the agreement made by the President, through the Secretary of State and the commissioners of Canada.

Now, let me read from this document, as sent in by the President, January 26 last. In paragraph 10, on page 2, of the communication of the Canadian commissioners there is this statement:

The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative.

The final sentence of that paragraph reads as follows:

Whenever pulp and paper of the classes already mentioned are admitted into the United States free of duty from all parts of Canada, then similar articles, when imported from the United States, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

Mr. LODGE. That is——

Mr. NELSON. In reply to that, I wish to call attention to what Mr. Knox, Secretary of State, says:

It is a matter of some regret on our part that we have been unable to adjust our differences on the subject of wood pulp, pulp wood, and print paper. We recognize the difficulties to which you refer growing out of the nature of the relations between the Dominion and Provincial Governments, and for the present—

I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to this language:

And for the present we must be content with the conditional arrangement which has been proposed in Schedule A attached to your letter.

Now, what is that? Let us read and see what that is, and that will explain the whole thing.

Mr. SHIVELY. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I will ask him from what is he reading?

Mr. NELSON. I am reading from what is attached to the letter of Messrs Fielding and Paterson, on page 5. This is a part of the proposition of Messrs. Fielding and Paterson:

Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper.

That is on the free list.

Provided—

I want to call the attention of Senators to these two provisos:

Provided, That such paper and boards, valued at 4 cents per pound or less, and wood pulp, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board: Provided also—

Now, here is the next proviso, on page 6:

Provided also, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

The second section of this bill, if the Senator will allow me, is utterly outside of the scope of this agreement in every point and particular. It is a new matter that has been injected into the bill, and is pure and simple tariff legislation, without any reciprocity agreement as the basis of it. Neither the President nor anybody else has the right to insist that section 2 is carrying out any bargain that we have made with Canada. And for the President or anybdy else to say that "you can not amend section 2 because it is what I have agreed to with Canada" is utterly groundless and without any foundation, because section 2 of this bill is outside the treaty entirely in that particular, and is outside of it just as much as though the President had never had any negotiation at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is very interesting. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Poindexter
Bailey	Crane	Hitchcock	Pomerene
Borah	Culberson	La Follette	Shively
Bourne	Cullom	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Bradley	Cummins	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Brown	Dixon	Nelson	Sutherland
Bryan	du Pont	Nixon	Swanson
Burnham	Foster	O'Gorman	Warren
Burton	Gallinger	Overman	Watson
Chamberlain	Gore	Page	Wetmore
Chilton	Gronna	Penrose	Williams
Clapp	Guggenheim	Perkins	Works

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is engaged with the Lorimer investigating committee.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is engaged in the Lorimer investigation, and is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment or two longer. I brought this matter up not because I am confident that this paper section as it stands is obnoxious to the favored-nation clause, although I think I see a manner in which it might be held to be very strongly obnoxious to that clause. I have brought it up because it is absolutely certain that foreign nations are going to make claims under the favored-nation clause in regard to this arrangement with Canada.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me if I make a suggestion?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Conceding, for the argument, that the Senator from Massachusetts is right, would not the whole matter be cured by the simple insertion of a statement to the effect that the concessions on one side are regarded as the consideration for the concessions on the other?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; and if the Senator will undertake to amend this bill I should be delighted to join in anything of that sort which would put it beyond doubt.

Mr. BACON. Possibly the Senator would like to see it amended.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not want to see it amended with anything outside of the agreement, as that would be. We have had a great many cases in the past on treaties which seemed to me obviously outside the favored-nation clause. We had it with Hawaii, in the sugar treaty. We had it in the Cuban treaty of reciprocity. It has occurred again and again.

Now, it is very desirable to avoid these contests with foreign nations, if possible. It is desirable to avoid these claims for equal concessions. It is not in the least that I am disturbed, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] suggested, at the amount of paper and pulp that will come in from other countries. There are very few countries in the world which make wood paper and pulp, and still fewer which have any surplus to export. It was testified before us by Mr. Herman Ridder, recently, the president of the Newspaper Publishers' Association, that it was not practical for them to get paper from Sweden and Norway, which are really the only exporting countries there are; that it was not practical for them to get it there, because it was too distant for paper. They could get wood pulp, but not paper; but that for newspapers, for their immediate demand, they had to have their paper supply very near, and the amount that those countries could export would be small.

It is not that which is disturbing me. It is because it seems to me so desirable not to make this treaty, this arrangement, this bill, as proof as we can make it against claims from foreign nations.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has been kind enough to call my attention to the agreement with Japan, made in 1894, which has been superseded by our recent treaty, but which contains the same clause. I should like to read it to the Senate to show how far the doctrine of the favored-nation clause goes. Article 14 of the treaty with Japan of 1894 provides:

The high contracting parties agree that in all that concerns commerce and navigation any privilege, favor, or immunity which either high contracting party has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the Government, ships, citizens, of subjects of any other State, shall be extended to the Government, ships, citizens, or subjects of the other high contracting party gratuitously, if the concession in favor of that other State shall have been gratuitous, and on the same or equivalent conditions if the concession shall have been conditional; it being their intention that the trade and navigation of each country shall be placed in all respects by the other upon the footing of the most favored nation.

Now that goes on—and there are other treaties with the same provision, with the favored-nation clause, laying down the undoubted law, as we hold it, about the concessions being gratuitous—to make provision that if concessions are made to other nations on conditions, they can have the same concessions on the same conditions.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have tried to make my point clear on this, and, as I say, my only object is to retain the agreement as it was made by the American and Canadian negotiators—whatever defects may have been in it—and the clause which has been omitted gives us really nothing. They at least, as diplomatists engaged in framing an agreement, understood the importance in a negotiation of this kind of making every item balance, or at least leaving no item without an express equivalent. The President has said that the Root amendment is in exact conformity with the agreement. In Canada it was received with approval.

Mr. Fielding, who negotiated the treaty, said that he thought the Root amendment made the treaty clearer, and he approved it, and the feeling in Canada—I am quoting from a dispatch from Ottawa which appeared the day after the report of the committee—is that they wanted the passage of the bill just as the Senate committee reported it.

The author of the amendment, who is not here now, offers it in no spirit of hostility. I voted for it in committee. I did so in no spirit of hostility. I think it will make the agreement better and stronger; otherwise I should not vote for it. I shall vote against all hostile amendments. I shall vote for the measure for general reasons, and for the principal reason that I think in the long view it is going to be of great advantage to draw Canada and the United States closer together.

But I do not desire to enter upon that phase to-day. At some later time in the debate I may have a little to say, but I only desired now to make it clear that there were some doubts raised by the present form of the agreement, as passed by the House, and that it was well to be on our guard and not take unnecessary risks of embroiling ourselves with other nations while we are trying to make a mutually beneficial agreement with Canada.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe the amendment was postponed until to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Until to-day.

Mr. LODGE. No; it was passed over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was passed over temporarily——

Mr. PENROSE. Until Wednesday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No——

Mr. PENROSE. I understood only for the calendar day of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that was the understanding; that it was passed over for the legislative day; but the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] gave notice that he would address the Senate upon the subject of that amendment and the bill in general to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not expect a vote on it to-day, but only wanted to correct a statement that the amendment was not pending to-day. I understand it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then if it is pending to-day, there being no further debate upon it, will there be a vote?

Mr. PENROSE, Mr. McCUMBER, and others. No.

Mr. PENROSE. The intention is not to ask for a vote to-day, because the Senator from New York has given notice to the Senate that he desires to address the Senate to-morrow on the pending amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I shall probably submit some observations on the amendment, not now, but after the Senator from New York has presented his views.

I present certain amendments to the bill, which I ask may be printed and, when printed, laid on the table, to be offered to the bill at some appropriate time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa presents certain amendments to the bill, which will be printed and lie on the table, according to his request, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I make a further request with regard to these amendments, because they are somewhat extensive and will, if adopted, change in some respects the concessions granted by the United States to Canada. My request is that the copy of the bill be printed as it would be with these amendments adopted, so that there can be a continuous reading of the amendments in connection with that part of the bill to which they are related, and the parts to be stricken out to be denoted by lines through the text and the part offered to be indicated by italics.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to take up this measure for extended discussion to-day, or to enter into the merits of it in detail or by comparison. But since yesterday seemed to be devoted to the statement of the position of the several Senators who occupied the time of the Senate, I desire at this early day, in order that I may not be misunderstood at any time during the consideration of this question, to state my position with reference to the proposed amendments.

I am unalterably opposed to the legislation; I am opposed to the treaty in support of which the legislation is proposed, and my opposition is not based primarily upon the details of the articles included within the measure. My objection begins with the statement of the principle that I am in favor of a protective tariff policy as a discriminating measure of legislation in favor of the whole country, without local application, because I regard it as a policy of government rather than one of barter and trade.

Entertaining that view, that a discriminating protective tariff is a policy of government, then I am bound to oppose this entire proposition, not because by a comparison of the rates or the difference of duty it may affect the wheat crop in one State or the cattle in another, but because it opens the market of the American people to the stranger, and the first effect of that is one of displacement in our market. I attach very much more importance to the question of displacement in our market than I do to the question of the difference of duty. If a foreigner sells a million bushels of wheat or a million dollars' worth of any commodity in our market, it means that the opportunity for our own citizen to sell the equivalent of that is lost and gone forever; that instead of the money being paid to our own citizen for the million bushels of wheat, it will be paid to a foreigner and the money will go out of the country and the wheat will come in to displace that opportunity to our own producer.

I am not going to vote for the Root amendment because it recognizes the validity, if I may use the word, of the bill itself. You can not amend this bill so that it will not, to the extent that it covers, destroy the American market. You might perhaps reduce to some extent the disadvantages of this bill by an equivalent to be gotten through the Root amendment, but the equivalent is so insignificant as compared with the whole item that it is not worth considering.

I will not vote to put anything on the free list in resentment of this proposed legislation. I am opposed to free trade either as a governmental policy or as a weapon with which to compel our people, or any part of them, to yield up the great principle of the protective tariff. I propose, so far as my action is concerned, to be true to the principle of a protective tariff policy such as the Republican Party has stood for without any compromise; and I shall not therefore vote for any amendment to this bill, whether with a view of lessening its evils or of striking at those who favor it in the spirit of resentment. In order that no one who may expect me to vote for an amendment that has that spirit behind it may be mistaken I desire——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Idaho will admit that the amendments I have offered, with which the Senator is familiar, are not in that spirit. I have offered an amendment to put the agricultural products of the country on the Canadian bill at reduced rates, about 50 per cent. It preserves a limited amount of protection, and there is nothing hostile to the spirit of true reciprocity in that.

Mr. HEYBURN. My objection to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is that it undertakes to cut in two the rights of our people. He says, "I will not utterly destroy you; I will reduce you from three meals a day to one." Now, that does not appeal to me. The measure of protection that the American people are entitled to is that which will give the American producer the American market, and all of it. Every dollar of competitive product that comes in displaces the opportunity of the producer in our own country. This being regarded as a principle, it can only be placed upon that foundation. If it is a question of barter and trade, then it is this: You trade wheat, oats, and barley for meat and corn, or something else. That, in my judgment, is not the protective-tariff policy. This Government had its origin in the necessity for protective-tariff legislation.

The object and purpose of those who came together to frame the Constitution—they did not come together to frame the Constitution, but they came together—and that coming together resulted in the framing of the Constitution, to regulate commerce. That was their declared and avowed purpose. They had commercial wars across the rivers between the States. When they came together and looked at this proposition, they arrived at the conclusion I have expressed, and that I now express, that the policy is either one of government or it is no policy at all. There can be no policy in trade or barter in regard to items. That is not policy; it is procedure.

Mr. President, looking at the question from this standpoint, I am unable to see how Republicans who have throughout a lifetime avowed themselves to be the adherents of a policy of government, can degenerate into hucksters in the products of our people. The product of the American people is the living of the American people. It is the support without which we could not be a people; we could not be a government; we would be in no better condition than the Indians, who traded in pelts and skins before we came.

It is as absolutely necessary to the cohesion of the American people as a government that they stand together as against other nations of the earth as it is that they have the right to use the soil, the attributes, and the resources of the land in which they live. Those are natural rights. The American people have a right to dwell upon, to cultivate, and to reap the benefit from dwelling upon and cultivating the soil. They have a right to the use of the forests and the mines and the rivers of the country in which they live, and from these uses they derive their livelihood, and their prosperity is measured by the manner of their use.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is refreshing to me, Mr. President, to hear some talk in this debate along protection lines. I know that those of us who stand for the principles of the Republican Party as enunciated in the days of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln are apparently in the minority, but I am delighted to know that there are yet some Senators who are not terrified at the existing condition of things.

Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if we are to adopt the policy of this so-called reciprocity agreement, which is a misnomer so far as Canada is concerned, if there is not an equal reason why we should extend it to the Republic of Mexico, our neighbor on the south.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would say that as I read the commercial treaties with Mexico we will be bound to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. But I want to ask the Senator further, as we hear a great deal of talk these days about affecting a union with the English-speaking peoples of the world, and especially Great Britain, a treaty I think now pending that it is said will bind us closer to the mother country, inasmuch as that country gives us free trade is there not greater reason why we should extend the free-trade principles of this so-called agreement with Canada to Great Britain and her colonies?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, whatever we have received from Great Britain we have taken on the point of a bayonet. We never took it from the open hand of charity or affection.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly true in a broad sense, but I am now speaking as to our economic relations with that country as well as other countries of the world. If, in other words——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will finish my sentence. If, in other words, there is any obligation upon us along any lines to give Canada access to our markets upon more favored conditions than we extend to other countries, why should we not extend that privilege to other countries?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is no reason why we should differentiate in favor of Canada, and there are many reasons why we should be more careful in guarding our doors against the menace close at hand than there is for guarding it against one across the sea.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. HEYBURN. As soon as the Senator from New Hampshire concludes.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho says he will not yield just now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have yielded to the Senator from New Hampshire, and if the Senator from Minnesota will wait a moment until that courtesy is complete, then I will be pleased to yield to him.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to say in answer——

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senator from Idaho says he will not yield at this time to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from New Hampshire desires to yield in favor of the Senator from Minnesota I have no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be pleased to yield to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. I wanted to answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire why we should not extend this privilege to other countries. I can only see one prospective benefit in this reciprocity agreement. It may lead to Canadian annexation. We can not hope to annex all the rest of the world, but if we can annex Canada we will accomplish a great deal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Canadian annexation is "an iridescent dream," to use the phrase of a distinguished Senator now dead. There was a time when that was very seriously considered by leading men in Canada, as I chance to know, but that is past. Canada has become a strong, vigorous, self-assertive nation, and we propose in this so-called reciprocity agreement to make Canada stronger and more vigorous and more self-assertive than she is to-day.

I was struck on yesterday by an observation made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I will detain the Senator but a moment. I thank him for his courtesy. It was in reference to the free entry of paper and wood pulp from Canada, when he said he would extend it to all the nations of the world; that is to say, that the paper and wood pulp from Finland, from Norway, and from Sweden should come into this market and absolutely destroy every paper-making industry in the United States. That would be the inevitable result. Yet the Senator from Nebraska is in favor of that.

If we are going into this business, Mr. President, I can see but one ultimate result, and that is, as the Senator from Idaho has suggested, perhaps not in words, that with some Republican help and with Democratic advocacy, perhaps wisely on the part of our Democratic friends from a party standpoint, we are taking out the foundation stone of the protective policy when we pass this bill, and we will be fortunate indeed as a Nation if the entire structure is not destroyed before we get through with our work.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt with something which may not be directly in connection with what the Senator from New Hampshire has just said, and what the Senator from Idaho has been discussing. However, I am unwilling that too much of the space of the RECORD should be occupied in the interval between the remarks of the Senator from Idaho in regard to England and the assertion on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire that what the Senator said is true, without there appearing a contention to the contrary of that. I think such a statement is a grave matter in view of our relations with England. The Senator from Idaho said that we owed her nothing; that we had never received anything from England that we did not get at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. HEYBURN. I spoke of governmental matters.

Mr. BACON. I know, but the Senator did not qualify it. The Senator spoke in most unqualified language, and the Senator from New Hampshire in equally unqualified language said "that is true."

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, I did qualify my observation, as the RECORD will show, by saying that what I had reference to was economic matters; and the Senator's statement that we had received nothing in a governmental way from Great Britain except through the sword I did assent to.

Mr. BACON. I do not know what we have ever gotten from England in the sense the Senator speaks of, by the sword, except the fact that we achieved our independence; and that is a long time ago for the remark now to be made that we have nothing from England except that which we have gotten at the point of the sword. I think we have more to enjoy which we have received from England than we have from all the other nations of the earth put together.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, Mr. President, we achieved our independence and we continued our independence, and if England had had her way in 1862 our Nation would have been destroyed, because she gave all the aid and comfort she could give to those who were attempting to destroy our Government.

Mr. BACON. The greatest criticism I have to make on England is that she did exactly the opposite thing. All that England had to do was to then lift her hand and the result the Senator speaks of would have been accomplished. However, I am not going into that discussion. I am perfectly content with the disclaimers of both Senators as to their purpose in what they said of England. I was unwilling that such utterances should appear in the RECORD and there be nothing said on the other side. Now, the Senators have disclaimed the meaning as I understood it and I am satisfied.

Mr. GALLINGER. If England had lifted her hand in 1862 other nations would have likewise lifted their hands.

Mr. BACON. That may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think I shall have to resume control of this question for a few minutes until the mind of man can quiet itself and get back on a conservative track.

Of course, that page of which the Senator from Georgia spoke when he said that he did not want it to appear unpunctured, perhaps would express it, was not complete when the Senator undertook to write his thoughts on it. When I spoke of taking away our liberties from England only upon the point of the bayonet, I did not refer to the class of benefits we have derived from England and from many nations and peoples of the earth, to which the Senator's mind seems to have attached itself.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me to finish this paragraph upon that page, we took our liberty from England, and we preserved it and protected it against England by the sword. We gained from England a race of people; we gained from England the traditions of human kind and all that that means in building up and maintaining a civilization and the culture which goes with it. We meet them to-day as intellectual, personal, and political equals, because we compelled them to recognize us as entitled to occupy that position. But I am discussing matters of a different character. I am not here to discuss the feeling of brotherly love that does or should exist between this and any other country. We are here to discuss business and commercial questions that affect our people, regardless of the effect upon the people of other nations whom we must concede to be equal to the task of taking care of their own people and the affairs of their people.

This line between Canada and the United States is more than an imaginary line, as it has been described repeatedly. It is a bulwark, a fortress, between the people of the United States and their rights and the people who stand behind that wall. It is a most important line to keep deeply and sharply marked upon the geography of the world so far as this country is concerned. It stretches from one shore to the other. There are the same number of States involved in this question, in point of interest, as were involved when the original struggle came for our freedom from England.

There are 13 border States standing to-day for their right under the laws of this country to protect the interest of their citizenship. They are calling upon the other States that would be less affected perhaps in a selfish sense and that ought to have the same principles of government to actuate and govern them as have these border States.

Is one State of this Union to play another against a foreign advantage? Is that patriotism? Is it patriotic for Texas or Alabama or Georgia to play the interests of Minnesota or Michigan or New York against the advantages which she might reap by subjecting those border States to rivalry in business and competition in trade, forsooth, because it might not affect the States lying farther to the south? That is not patriotism. Patriotism is not a matter of State lines. It is limited only by the extent of all over which the flag floats. The patriotism that is limited to less than the national interest is not patriotism at all; it is selfishness.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me right there?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator speaks about our States, one of the principal grievances that is held by the States in the group to which the one from which I come belongs is the principle and cardinal policy of the party to which the honorable Senator belongs, a principle which seeks to enrich one part of the country in an utter ignoring of interests of the part of the country from which I come, so far as the great business of agricultural production is concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not concede it.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to tell exactly what I mean. The article of cotton furnishes the largest single export of any other product—agricultural, mineral, or manufacturing. I can go further. Unless the figures have been altered by the last census, it furnishes as much as any other two articles put together. In its total production it amounts to a thousand million dollars a year. It is the basic industry upon which rests the prosperity and development of that whole section. Yet it is a fact that the protective tariff, of which the Senator is so great an advocate and of which he is so stout a champion, is one which lays all of its burdens upon the people who are engaged in that great industry, when by reason of the fact that the price of cotton is necessarily fixed in Liverpool those who are engaged in that production can receive no benefit from the protective duty.

Now, the Senator speaks in very eloquent terms of the great injustice of a policy which is not national, one which does not extend all its benefits in a general way to all the people. Yet I point the Senator to the fact that this tremendous industry, with its thousand million dollars of product in one year, with its export more than that of any other two products of the country—agricultural, mineral, or manufacturing—is one in which there is not this national consideration, but against which there is this most marked and pronounced discrimination.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it would be impossible in a country of this size that every industry should be equally represented in every part of it. Government is a question of compromise, as is business, as is humankind. One man or one community receives a benefit that it would be impossible to bestow upon another. It does not follow because every section of the country can not benefit by reason of one act of legislation that that legislation, in the great balance of equality, is not wise.

The Senator from Georgia knows well that there are many other interests and industries in that State that do benefit by reason of the protective tariff as it has in the past been enacted and administered.

Mr. BACON. And not a single one of which could survive one year were it not for the success of the great industry of which I have spoken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the thing of most value to the State of Georgia and to every other State in the Union is a market for its productions.

Mr. BACON. That is true, Mr. President, but where is the cotton market? Is that made by the protective tariff?

Mr. HEYBURN. The cotton market is upon the backs of 90,000,000 people in the United States. Should they discard the use of cotton, then perhaps the Senator from Georgia might realize that its prosperity depended upon the prosperity that enabled other people to wear its production in the shape of clothes.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from Idaho contend that the amount of cotton sold depends upon the protective tariff or the manufactured articles of cotton? In other words, does the Senator contend because you make a cotton shirt more expensive in the United States by putting a tariff on it, therefore the man who has cotton to sell to make the shirt will sell more of it on that account?

Mr. HEYBURN. The man who wears a cotton shirt in the United States is a $5 man, and the man who wears it in some other country is about a 35-cent man. That is the difference.

Mr. BACON. That may be; but, nevertheless, he has to sell the same amount of cotton all the same, and it is a question whether the price of cotton is in any manner affected so far as to enhance it by reason of the protective tariff. Does the Senator contend that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I suppose the Senator would not like to have the mills of the South deprived of the protection that they use?

Mr. BACON. I certainly would—every dollar of it over and above what is necessary to raise revenue for the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it is evident the Senator from Georgia belongs to a different economic school from that which I profess.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEYBURN. In one moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have yielded to the Senator from Georgia. I am not at liberty to yield to another Senator as long as the Senator from Georgia is exercising that privilege.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. BACON. I was not interrupting the Senator; he was proceeding. He said that he belonged to a different school from myself, and it is the first thing I have agreed with him on.

Mr. HEYBURN. That being conceded, there is one task that I would not undertake at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and that is to convert the Senator from Georgia to my political belief.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, I will say to him that it would take him not only this afternoon, but the balance of the century, to prove that any law passed in this country fixes the price of cotton. The price of cotton is fixed in Liverpool.

Mr. HEYBURN. Some day when the question of the tariff as applied within our own country in the enactment of a tariff law is before the Senate, and the Senate will have patience to listen to me, I may take up that phase of the question of protection, but it is not within the line of the subject I have undertaken to discuss briefly this afternoon. I have heard that doctrine; it is not unfamiliar at all; but in a proper hour and at a proper time let us discuss it.

Mr. BACON. I hope when the Senator proposes to discuss the question as to how the protective tariff affects the price of cotton I will be present to hear him.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The unfortunate and remarkable thing upon the part of the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and, in fact, with the Republican Party, is that they attribute the magnificent prosperity in the North, the West, the East, and the South to their iniquitous and intolerable and dishonest tariff policy. That we have grown beyond the parallel of nations no one will dispute, but our Republican friends give no credit to the magnificent condition that surrounds us and the magnificent conglomerate which makes up American citizenship. That we have grown is true, but we have grown in spite of your tariff. I have listened to such talk with the greatest interest. It was really worth a trip across the continent to see the heaving breasts of our Republican friends and the tearful eyes for the farmer, and yet, my friends, all your tariff process has been a burden upon the farmer. You say we have grown rich through your process of tariff. We insist that we have not shared nor fared equally in your process of tariff.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can not at this late hour yield the floor, and while I am very much pleased to be interrupted by the Senator from New Jersey and take notice of his suggestion in regard to the credit to be given for prosperity in this country, I think it would be well at this time, inasmuch as I am——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I realize, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho can not be interrupted until he has assented to interruption.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. He will be, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey is not yet recognized.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEYBURN. For a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have simply to say to the Senator from Idaho that you are big enough in stature and broad enough in intellect to be generous. We do not feel that we are foes; but we feel that we are American citizens, and you have banquetted and grown rich, politically, on fostering this intolerable nonsense regarding the tariffs; and as a farmer I must enter my protest against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a well-rounded sentence, Mr. President, and I decline further to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines further to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have been entertained by such preachments for many years; I have heard them throughout my life; and I have concluded that, as a rule, it is best to leave the reply to the future. We have only to look over the history during our own lives to know the facts. The policy of protection is as old as the country. The policy of free trade, which is evidently what the Senator from New Jersey speaks for, has never been successfully applied to our country, and no man will rise in his place and say that the free-trade policy as a political principle has ever brought and sustained prosperity to the American people——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Outside of certain establishments with their gilt signs "Money to loan," and things like that. They have prospered. Does the Senator from Oklahoma——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, may I——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] first rose and addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HEYBURN. For a question.

Mr. OWEN. When the Senator from Idaho said that no man would rise in his place and speak of the value of free trade——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not. I said no man would rise in his place and say that prosperity had been brought about and maintained by free trade.

Mr. OWEN. I rise in my place for the purpose of saying that, if the Senator will permit me to say it.

Mr. HEYBURN. What does the Senator say? Will he name the period and section of the country where this prosperity existed under free trade?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Idaho, I will say that the prosperity of the United States from the foundation of this Government until the present time is due to the freedom of trade between the States of this Union. We have 46 great States here. We have perfect freedom of intercourse.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I will have to call that sentence off.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines further to yield.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines further to yield, and, if the Senator from Idaho will permit the Chair for one moment, the Chair desires to call to the attention of the Senate its own rule, which the Chair has been attempting to enforce, and has had very poor success thereat in the last day or two—

When a Senator desires to speak—

he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized.

Further on, in the same rule, it is provided that—

No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent.

It does seem to the Chair that, particularly within the last two or three days, Senators have fallen into the habit of interrupting a Senator on the floor without addressing the Chair or without waiting for the permission of the Senator, and gone on to make addresses when the Senator had said he yielded for a question, but not for a speech. It is of no consequence to the Chair whether the Senate lives up to its rules or not, but it is for the Senate; and the Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the exact provision of the rule.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OWEN. In case a Senator on the floor invites another Senator to rise and express himself, does the rule provide for that opportunity?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would say that that was a case where the Senator had submitted to the interruption and that then the Senator could proceed, but that he first must address the Chair and be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I think I need not explain, and especially need not apologize, for declining to be further interrupted for a discussion of the question of the trade between the States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want it to go into the RECORD, side by side with what the Senator has said, that at no period in the history of this Government has "free trade," as he expresses it, ever prevailed. If the Senator means to challenge a contradiction of his statement that the country has not prospered and prospered most happily under a revenue tariff, I am prepared to contradict that, and I am prepared to cite him to the time when that condition existed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have not referred to a revenue tariff, although I would not retreat from the challenge to discuss it; yet to enter upon it would be taking me away from the line of my purpose to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, of course no Senator can accept the challenge the Senator makes to specify a time when the country prospered under free trade, because that time has never existed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am indebted to the Senator from Texas for sustaining my statement.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted, since which time I have digressed far from the line of my thought, I was speaking of the character of the boundary between this country and Canada so far as it was necessary to consider it in relation to this question. I say that it is much more important that the law be strictly drawn and strictly enforced between this country and Canada than between this country and any other country in the world, unless it be Mexico, because they are those having most ready access to our territory. In the case of Mexico, they are a cheap-producing and a cheap-living people, while in the case of Canada they are large producers with a scant market; so that they are both of them dangerous so far as our trade is concerned.

I care not whether the Liverpool market fixes the price of wheat. I will never reach that question in arriving at a conclusion that will dictate my action in this matter. I do not minimize it and I do not reflect upon the judgment of those who use it as a basis of argument, but I say there is a larger and a broader principle that is sufficient in itself to control us in wise legislation.

In the American nation of people there is no North or South or East or West; their rights are equal, their opportunities are as variant as it is possible to imagine, but they are nevertheless the American people, owing allegiance to their country and owing support to each other. No man in this great family of the Nation, because he might be benefited perhaps, has a right to do that which would affect or destroy the prosperity or happiness of other people. It is a question, as I was saying when interrupted, of mutual concession, one section of the country to another; but that principle does not carry beyond the lines of our country. Patriotism ends at the border line in times of peace. It is only carried beyond the border line to the music of the fife and with the flag in times of war. At other times it is here at home, and in the exercise of that patriotic duty of citizenship we must look to the interest of the people as a whole and see to it that no part of our country is called upon to sacrifice the interests of its people in order that some other part of the country may have something beyond what they are entitled to.

Mr. President, the farmer and the mechanic, the laborer and the loafer, live under the same law. We do not classify men for the purpose of making laws in this country. There is no preferred class. The farmers' rights are no greater than those of the mechanic. Whenever we depart from that rule we are then in danger of doing just what is sought to be done here or proposed to be done in the enactment of this legislation. If you deviate from the rule in the one case, there is no method by which you can determine where it shall cease.

Mr. President, that is the reason I said in the beginning that this is a political principle and not a trading market. The principle being established, there will be found no difficulty in applying it to the several interests. The first thing in a government is to establish the principle of government, not its policy. The policy of a government is written in its laws. The principle is that from which the policy flows.

Above all, avoid following the policy of any man. I resent men foisting their policies upon the Government in lieu of the law. I resent the modification or evasion of the law through what is termed the policy of this man or that.

I am going to discuss this question without attacking the President of the United States or reflecting upon him. We differ in regard to this measure, but it does not follow that either differing party is corrupt or insane. There is great room for differences of opinion in this country. I am not going to leave the Republican organization because of what it does or does not do in this matter. The repairs to be made in the household of the Republican Party are to be made by its friends within the household, and not by the process of demolition from the outside. The thing that I stand for is the principle of the party; and the party is composed of the individuals that support that principle or the principles of a majority of the party. They may go astray temporarily, and I may differ from a large majority of my party, but I will continue to work within that party and I will not go out and join those who have no sympathy with it and who are trying to destroy it.

More than once in my lifetime I have been brought face to face with the question as to whether I would go with the cry and the excitement of the hour because it was going to win, or whether I would stay at home and wait for those who went out to come back in their saner moments with the experience of the period as their future guide.

Mr. President, I did not intend and do not intend to enter further upon the discussion of this matter to-day. There are specific questions involved in the consideration of this proposed legislation that I may feel called upon from time to time to discuss to some extent, and having outlined, as I think, candidly and fairly my position, I will allow the matter, so far as I am concerned to-day, to rest.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 20, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the men of old who climbed the heights of glory, dreamed dreams, and saw visions which illumine the present, to guide us on our way. Grant that the visions of the now may cast their light far out into the future, to guide those who shall come after us to larger life and grander achievements, that humanity may march on with steady and unfaltering footsteps until the ruling passion of men shall be love to Thee and to their fellow men; that man's inhumanity to man may perish in the strife of men to overcome evil with good. And pæans of praise we will ever give to Thee, our God and our Father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, June 19, 1911, was read and approved.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. SULZER in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, general debate has been closed by general consent on the bill. I will ask that the Clerk read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill has been closed, and the Clerk will now read the bill by sections under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, the articles hereinafter enumerated, described, and provided for shall, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), be subjected to the duties hereinafter provided, and no others; that is to say——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of lines 3 to 9, inclusive, page 1, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out paragraphs 360 to 395, inclusive, of section 1 of said act, as they now read, and by inserting in lieu thereof as part of section 1 of said act the following."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the point of order, I did not understand the amendment offered by the gentleman. It said, "Insert the following." Had the Clerk finished reading the paragraph?

Mr. MANN. Yes. That is, the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves all points of order.

Mr. MANN. There is no point of order on the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not understand, from hearing the amendment read at the desk. I understand now, and I have no point of order to make.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not object, Mr. Chairman, to the request of the gentleman to proceed for 10 minutes, nor shall I object to the request of any gentleman to proceed for 10 minutes, because I think that is a reasonable latitude to discuss amendments; but if a request is made to proceed for longer than 10 minutes I shall object.

Mr. MANN. There might be some case where the gentleman would be willing to give an extension.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from Alabama and to the House that I think with a reasonable amount of debate we will still be able to get through the bill to-day.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "A bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool."

It is a bill independent, by itself. It is not and does not purport to be an amendment to the existing tariff law. If passed, its language takes effect as a new, independent law, repealing, of course, those laws that are inconsistent with it. But it is not inserted as a part of the Payne law, and by its passage it does not become an amendment to the Payne law.

The amendment I have offered proposes to have the bill inserted as an amendment to the Payne law, so that it will not repeal other provisions in the Payne law which may or ought to remain in the law. For instance, the Payne law provides that nothing in that act shall be held or construed to abrogate in any way the Cuban reciprocity treaty or the law based upon it; but if this bill be enacted as a separate and independent act, fixing, as it does, the rates of duty upon woolen importations, it absolutely repeals, so far as wool and woolen goods are concerned, both the Cuban reciprocity treaty and the Cuban reciprocity law which we passed. If this should be inserted as an amendment to the Payne law, it would not repeal the maximum and minimum provisions of the law; but if it be passed as an independent measure, as it now stands, it absolutely repeals, so far as wools and woolens are concerned, the maximum and minimum provisions of the existing tariff law.

If it is the purpose of the majority of the House to repeal the maximum and minimum provisions of the law as to wool and woolens, then the offer of the bill is correct; but if it is intended to leave to our country the maximum and minimum club, which has been used quite effectively so far, then this should be inserted as an amendment to the Payne law. The amendment which I have offered is to strike out the paragraphs of the Payne law relating to wool and woolens and to insert the text of this bill as an amendment to the Payne law. That would be the ordinary and sensible provision for amending this law.

That is not all. As will be shown later in the debate—or perhaps it may be well to refer to it now—this bill contains all through it the provision:

Not otherwise specified in this act.

Manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool, not otherwise specified in this act.

I called the attention of the House, in my opening speech on this bill, to the fact that under its provisions it would put the woolen tariff upon every piece of goods composed partly of wool and partly of cotton, and I was told by gentlemen on that side of the House who were not well informed that if the goods were composed in chief value of cotton they would pay the cotton schedule, and if composed in chief value of wool they would pay the woolen schedule. That is true of the existing law, because the courts have said that under the existing law there was special provision made, so that where goods were composed in chief value of cotton they would pay the cotton schedule; but as this bill is not an amendment to the existing law, as it does not purport to amend the existing law, and as it is written last, its provisions take effect as independent provisions, and the provisions of this bill are that all manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool shall pay the duty provided in this act unless otherwise specially provided for in this act. Now, if the amendment which I offer prevails, the term "this act" will apply to the law to which this is amendatory—the existing tariff law—but if my amendment does not prevail, the term "this act" will refer to this woolen-schedule act; and there being no other provision in this act in reference to goods composed in part of wool, then all goods composed in part of wool must pay the duty fixed by this act.

For instance, we authorize in the existing law the importation by a traveler abroad coming home of $100 worth of wearing apparel; but this act, if it passes in its present form, will, so far as woolen goods are concerned, repeal the existing law, because this act provides that all woolen goods shall pay the duty provided for "in this act," the new act, unless otherwise specially provided for "in this act," the new act.

But if the amendment which I have offered prevails, that language might remain in because then it would be an amendment to an existing act and the term "this act" would apply to the existing law.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to inquire of the gentleman if it is his assumption that cloths imported now under the Payne bill are assessed according to the quantity of wool or cotton they may contain?

Mr. MANN. It is not my impression at all. Cloths imported now are assessed on a woolen schedule, but if their chief value be cotton, composed chiefly of cotton, there is a special provision that they shall take the cotton-schedule duties.

Mr. KENDALL. And if their chief value is woolen, composed chiefly of wool, they take the woolen-schedule duties?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. And the gentleman's contention is that no matter how slight may be the presence of wool, under this language it would have to take the woolen schedule?

Mr. MANN. Under the provisions of this bill silk goods which paid $3, if they have one yarn of woolen in them will pay the woolen-schedule duties; in the same way they have construed the provisions with reference to mercerized cotton.

The way is to amend the Payne law; insert the balance of section 1 in this bill in quotation marks showing it becomes a part of the existing law, and strike out the provisions that are now in the existing law. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois is always so cocksure that he knows all the law that it is really difficult to take issue with him on any question. I would hesitate myself to take issue with him on this important question if the Treasury Department had not already decided that this bill covers what the gentleman from Illinois says it ought to cover.

Now, as to the language of this bill, except as to the first provision relating to raw wool, which we changed entirely because we put it under the ad valorem rate, wiped out the classification under the specific rates of duty—the language of this bill practically in all parts follows the language of the Payne bill, and the only changes that are made is to change the rates of duty from specific and ad valorem rates combined—that is, compound duties—to strictly ad valorem duties.

Now, the very language that the gentleman complains we have left out of this bill is inserted in this bill in order to conform to the decisions of the court, which I have here on my desk, if the gentleman from Illinois wants to investigate them.

Mr. MANN. I have investigated them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I submitted the language of this bill to the Treasury Department before we offered it in the committee, and requested them to criticize the language, so that it would conform to the rulings of the Treasury Department and in order that we would not have to go outside and bring about new decisions.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which he refers to this very proposition which the gentleman from Illinois thinks so important to insert in order that goods composed in the chief part of wool will come under the classification of wool. The paragraph to which the decision was rendered of the Payne bill corresponds to paragraph 7 of this bill. I will not take the time to read the entire letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, but in reference to paragraph 7, similar to the one referred to in the decision that the gentleman from Illinois refers to, the court in the United States against Johnson, the Treasury Department, in its letter, says:

Paragraph 7 of the proposed draft provides for women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, etc., composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for. If this paragraph is intended to cover any women's and children's dress goods, etc., no matter whether cotton, flax, or other fiber is the element of chief value, when composed in part of wool, then it should carry that intent into the paragraph in specific language, for the reason that the courts have repeatedly held that the corresponding provision in the act of 1897, paragraph 366, for cloths made wholly or in part of wool, covers only such cloths in which wool is the element of chief value, the latest decision upon this subject being that of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in United States v. Johnson (157 Fed. Rep., 754).

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I can not yield, I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. We will give the gentleman more time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not desire to ask for more time, because I do not desire to yield to anyone more than 10 minutes.

So that as to the provisions of this bill, if the language is incorrect, then the language in the Payne bill was incorrect, and the language in the Dingley bill was incorrect; and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] we were careful to follow the language of the Payne bill, except so far as it related to the change from a compound rate of duty to an ad valorem rate of duty, because we wanted but one issue to come before the American people on this question, and that was the issue of rates—as to whether they desire to stand by a relative ad valorem rate of 90 per cent on the woolen schedule or an average ad valorem rate of 42½ per cent on the woolen schedule.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to yield, as my time is nearly up. As to the other objection that the gentleman raises in reference to this bill, I concede that the law in reference to the Cuban treaty will be wiped out in reference to wool and woolens if this bill is passed, because this is a law enacted, if it is enacted by Congress, subsequent to the ratification of that treaty. There is no issue between the gentleman and me, but I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are no importations of raw wool coming from Cuba, and the importations of woolen goods and woolen manufactures coming from Cuba in the last year amounted, if I recollect the figures correctly, to about $101—certainly not over a few hundred dollars of importations coming from Cuba.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to yield.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is in charge of the bill and he ought to be willing to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. MANN. Would not even that change in the Cuban treaty invalidate the entire treaty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so. It would not invalidate it at all, unless the Cuban Government said that they wanted the treaty wiped out, and they could do that whether this bill was passed or not. If they notified us that they wanted to give up the treaty, they could do so, but I take it that when there is only a hundred dollars or a little more than a hundred dollars worth of wool imported into this country from Cuba that the Cuban Government will not think that those importations are of the importance that the gentleman from Illinois thinks they are and ask for a revocation of the treaty.

As to the maximum and minimum tariff, everybody except the partisans of the Payne law on that side of the House recognizes that the maximum and minimum rates enacted into law in the Payne tariff law have been an absolute failure. The President of the United States was driven home from Canada in disgust because of the enactment of the inefficient maximum and minimum rates in the Payne tariff law; and, so far as I am concerned, I am not only willing to repeal the maximum and minimum rates in the Payne law, so far as they relate to the wool schedule, but when the proper time comes I would be glad to see them absolutely repealed and wiped off the statute books and the law enacted by which this Government could negotiate pacts with foreign nations that would be effective and be of some benefit to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say this amendment ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 83, noes 142.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute to offer to sections 1, 2, and 3 of this bill. I want to give notice now and also ask the Chair if it is in order to offer my substitute when the bill has been fully read, and whether I will be recognized to do that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will determine that when the bill is read. The Chair can not determine that now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I thought the gentleman was asking unanimous consent. Of course I can not consent to any amendment being taken up except it is relevant to the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, of the many iniquities of this bill there is none more glaring than the proposed tariff on raw wool.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard a good deal here during the past three or four months in reference to the protection the farmer is receiving. It seems that there is a determination throughout the country by some people if possible to annihilate the farmer and to ruin his prosperity. You have passed a bill here, the Canadian reciprocity bill, that is now at the other end of the Capitol, which, if it becomes a law, will as sure as the sun comes up in the morning ruin the dairy industry of this country and injure the farmer generally. Now you are attempting to strike a blow at those who are engaged in the raising of sheep by putting a tariff which amounts to practically nothing. Forty per cent ad valorem will be a less rate than he is receiving, but it will be somewhere near to what he is entitled, and it does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to increase this rate to 40 per cent. Of course I have no hope it will be increased in the face of the determination of the other side of the Chamber to pass the bill as it is.

I will say, Mr. Chairman, that so far as I am concerned I am willing to take a tariff for the farmer on everything which he produces which equalizes the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, but can any man here tell me what is the difference in the cost of the production of wool here and abroad? What we want to know are the facts. We do know positively that there is a great difference in the way sheep are grown, and we do know positively that there is a great difference in that cost; and it seems to me we ought to wait until we have definite information; and when that information is obtained I am willing to let the people I represent take the result, whether it be a protective tariff for the farmer or not; but until we have that information I am unwilling to have the farmer deprived of all substantial protection on all his products, and so, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHARP, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FRENCH rose.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 1, strike out the word "twenty" and substitute therefor the word "thirty."

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, although the word "thirty" does not imply much more than the word "twenty," I wish to say in all sincerity that I do not offer this amendment to increase the duty merely out of a captious spirit, but with the belief that if adopted it will mean certainly a 50 per cent increase in the revenue that is to be derived from the importation of the raw product, as estimated under the provisions of this bill. I did not get an opportunity to speak at length upon this question during the general debate, and in the brief time allotted under the rules of the House it will be impossible for me to enter into anything like a full discussion of this important subject, but I was impressed with the remarks of my colleague——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if that increase on wool of 10 per cent is made in this House will the gentleman then vote to increase the fabric duties accordingly?

Mr. SHARP. Not until I understand that question a great deal better than I do now.

Mr. HILL. You will not vote to increase the fabric duties accordingly. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he will not vote to increase the fabric duties accordingly?

Mr. SHARP. Not until I understand that feature of the bill better than I do at the present time. In connection with that question, let me say that I was a great deal interested in the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] the other day, and, drawing my conclusions from his very thorough explanation of the operations of the American Woolen Co., or trust, as it is called, I am not one of those who are willing at this time to believe that it needs any special consideration or favors at the hand of the House. Certainly a company which, in season and out during the past 12 years, covering two periods of financial and industrial depression, can continue to declare regularly 7 per cent dividends per annum upon their preferred stock, which has grown in amount to a total issue of $40,000,000, which dividends actually declared and paid out have amounted to $21,583,000, in addition to a large amount of surplus, besides charging off for repairs and renewals at least $15,000,000, according to that gentleman's statement, is not an object of my special solicitude at this time.

I was very much interested as well as amused by the facetious humor indulged in by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] in his comments upon the report accompanying this bill. His speech was witty and highly humorous. I think, however, in the light of some of the speeches during the long debate upon this bill, now extending over two weeks, on both sides of the House, it is hardly too much for me to say that it would not be out of place to have a little more elementary knowledge upon some of these vexed questions upon which we must vote to-day. I differ from some of my colleagues upon this side of the House as to the doctrine of free raw materials and its application.

The other day I heard the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] learnedly discuss the question of raw material, and he was asked, during his speech, whether he was in favor of removing the duty entirely upon wool. The gentleman replied by saying that anybody who voted for the removal of the duty upon lumber, making it free raw material, in order to be consistent ought to vote for free wool.

But, gentlemen, it seems to me that no wider differences could be presented in the status of any so-called raw material than those of lumber and wool. In the former case, the supply is generally conceded to be held in the hands of a very few great timber owners, and the existence of a lumber trust is now under investigation. Then, too, by the American people being permitted to use free of duty the lumber of Canada our own supply would be better preserved and its use prolonged. Besides, it is not a business which has to be developed by long and patient toil, as the supply of timber is ready for the woodsman's ax upon the shortest preparation. In the consideration, however, of the product of wool it must be conceded that substantially the opposite conditions prevail. Looking at it from its aspect as a revenue producer, there is also a wide difference between them, for during the last fiscal year the revenues derived from the importation of lumber amounted to only about $2,000,000, while that on wool was 10 times that amount. In at least all of the Eastern and Middle States sheep are owned by the farming class and divided into comparatively small flocks. No trust relation exists among them, and only by the greatest care and development of their sheep, aided by length of time, has it been able to develop this valuable source of our country's wealth. I believe the preservation of our wool-growing flocks, both from the standpoint of food product as well as for clothing material, is a conservation of our resources in the fullest sense. The history of the past shows that the strongest nations have been those that have cultivated its wool industry, and in times of war or famine its value to a nation is invaluable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHARP. In so far as lumber is concerned, I voted in favor of free lumber in order to save our own product, and, if possible, let down the gates, getting our supply from Canada, in order that the life of our own forests might be prolonged and the product cheapened to the consumer by such competition.

The importance, nay, the necessity, of raising a revenue from this product—and, I am sorry to say, I think more or less in a partisan sense doubt has been thrown upon the motive of the majority as to the purpose of imposing this duty upon wool—should not be overlooked. The revenues derived from the wool schedule, I believe, are next in amount to that received from any other imported article, that on raw wool alone amounting to substantially half the entire amount received under this schedule. The adoption of this amendment would, in my judgment, result in the saving of at least $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 per annum to our revenues, if the estimates of the framers of the bill are to be relied upon. Then, too, it seems to me that it would be, to the extent in which the increase in the rate of duty is provided by the amendment, just that much fairer and more just to the woolgrower. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP] has just said, and truly said, if there is any class of producers in the United States to-day that have always been entirely free from the cry of a combination and trust it is the great farming element.

We hear very much about the profits of the farmers, and yet the more we investigate the high cost of living, the more our attention is called to the undisputed fact that at least one-half of it comes in the cost of distribution. The farmer by no means gets the measure of profit that is supposed to exist upon his products when he takes them to the retail grocer and merchant. I believe, if the truth be known, that the cost between the manufacturer and the consumer in most lines of goods, as well as between the farmer and the consumer, really is doubled, and often more than this, before it reaches the hands of the consumer.

Some strictures have been indulged in by gentlemen on the other side of the House as to the methods adopted by the majority in binding its members by the action of the caucus. As one who has exercised the right to differ at times from his party associates—the use of which right, let me say, has never been questioned—I can not subscribe to this view. Our party has adopted liberal rules and made generous exceptions that will allow any Member to express by his vote his honest convictions; and certainly no complaint can justly be made upon the action of this caucus as it has to do with the vote upon this bill.

Let me conclude by saying that if we can not adopt this amendment here in the House, yet I hope before the bill receives the sanction of the Senate at the other end of the Capitol and becomes enacted into law, some of the reasons which I have endeavored to set forth in advocacy of this amendment may find favor with that body. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in presenting this bill to the House, made a somewhat lengthy and very interesting speech. It has not yet, I believe, been printed in the RECORD. In the course of his speech he was kind enough to yield to me for a question, in which I very briefly made a statement or two. I want to restate in substance what I said then, consuming a minute or two for that purpose.

The gentleman from Alabama, in discussing the bill, said that the duty upon raw wool under the law now—the Payne law, now in force—was only compensatory——

Mr. DALZELL. Competitive——

Mr. CANNON. Yes; was competitive. I had in mind the next step, and I misquoted the word——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Highly competitive, I said.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. The gentleman said that the duty on manufactures was protective, but the duty on the wool was competitive, commencing at 11 cents a pound on raw wool, and increasing on washed and scoured wool; and he said that this pending bill was not to protect, but to yield revenue, and therefore he insisted that the bill should receive support.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP], for whose opinion I have high respect, especially as he comes from Ohio, where they grow wool, said that his amendment, providing for 30 per cent duty, would be a better revenue producer than 20 per cent, the rate fixed in the bill. I am inclined to believe that he is correct in that statement; but that, even, would not measure up to the competitive point.

Now, this bill, confessedly, if it becomes a law, is away below the difference in the cost of production of wool in the United States and its production by the competitive woolgrowers elsewhere in the world.

I merely wanted to call attention to the matter by having the gentleman restate in my remarks what he said in his general speech. The gentleman from Ohio kindly and courteously has my sympathy. He comes from Ohio. He confesses he is bound by the caucus action that will destroy the wool industry in the United States and greatly damage that industry in the State of Ohio, as well as elsewhere in the country. It seemed to me his voice is the voice of Jacob, but his vote will be the hand of Esau. [Applause on the Republican side.] Whether that voice of Jacob is going to materialize in the coming campaign in Ohio I do not know. I am not the gentleman's constituent. I consign him to his constituency. While I will not enter the domain of prophecy, I think they will discover by his vote the hand of Esau. Now, that is about all I desire to say on this particular amendment.

Oh, you are going to pass this bill, of course, and all that we can do is from time to time briefly to register our objections. If I did not have regard for the industries of the country—for the wool industry, the industries in factory and on farm—from the mere political standpoint, if I were playing from that standpoint, I would bid you Godspeed. But larger than the political standpoint, larger than the success or failure of the Democratic Party——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Just a minute more, if I can have it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I will not consume all of the five minutes.

I say, larger than the welfare of any political organization, or the election of a President or of a House, or the indorsement of a President for reelection, is the well-being and prosperity of the men, women, and children, 90,000,000 strong, who constitute the great Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in a speech which I made in this House on Saturday last I presented some tables based on an actual analysis of wool content of woolen cloth, showing that the compensatory duty under this bill on the average amounts to 11.76 per cent, and that the protective duty under this bill amounts to 29.62 per cent.

I do not know whether it is the intention of gentlemen on that side of the aisle to try to justify that protective duty from the standpoint of a tariff for revenue. I do not believe it can be done. I am in favor of this amendment because I think it tends to equalize the duty to the wool grower and to the manufacturer. Its effect would be to increase the compensatory duty in the cloth about 5 per cent and reduce the protective duty about 5 per cent.

In an analysis and an investigation of the cost of production in foreign countries and in this country two years ago, Mr. W. A. Graham-Clark, special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, submitted the results of his investigation, and these results were made the basis, in part, of the argument in the Senate two years ago. His investigation shows that the labor cost of producing woolen cloth in England is slightly less than 25 per cent. Assuming that the labor cost in this country is double that amount, it would only justify a protective duty upon woolen cloth of 25 per cent. So it seems to me that the adoption of this amendment will do no injustice to the manufacturer of woolen cloth. It does not necessitate any other or further change in this bill, and it seems to me that justice requires that it be adopted.

I was one of those who stood in this House a few days ago when we took the vote upon the reciprocity measure. That day I saw many men here vote to take from the farmer the fruits of his victory in the very morning of his triumph. So far as I am concerned, it seems to me that justice should be done him now.

I am not entirely sure as to just what the duty upon raw wool should be, but I believe that a duty of 30 per cent on raw wool will do the manufacturer no injustice under this bill, and I trust that the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House is one to reduce the tariff on the woolen schedule. Some complain that we have reduced the rate on raw wool too low, while others declare that we should have put raw wool on the free list. It were strange indeed if in this body of 391 Members any bill could be reported which would precisely meet the views of each.

The task of the Democratic majority here is a very delicate one. We must so steer our ship that she shall neither go aground in the shallows of stagnant conservatism nor be dashed to pieces on the rocks of radicalism. Fortunately for us we have a chart by which we may safely sail the political sea—the tariff plank of the Denver platform. It declares for "an immediate reduction of import duties" by such "gradual reductions as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis."

This tariff plank is a declaration for neither protection nor for free trade, but for a revenue tariff. Many prominent Democrats are free traders, but in all of its history the party has never declared for that policy. It has universally stood for a tariff for revenue.

How shall we pass from a policy of a tariff for protection to one for revenue? Our platform points the way—by "such gradual reduction as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis." Why was it thought necessary to declare for a "gradual reduction"? Why not do it suddenly? The answer is easy. A half century has been devoted to building up an evil protective policy. It has been the law of the land. Many honest enterprises have been undertaken with this law in force. The statesmen who wrote the Denver platform desired the people to know that if we came into power we would immediately enter upon "a reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis," but that we would not do it with such violence that disaster might follow. If a man were in the top story of a burning building he could remain and be burned or he could come down. If he determined to come down, he could choose between two methods. He could jump out of a window and collapse upon the ground. That would be the quickest way. Or he could climb down the fire escape. That would be the safest way.

If this bill be compared with the Payne bill, it will be found that we are climbing down the tariff-reduction fire escape with much speed. Be patient with us, Mr. Chairman, and ere long we will in safety get down onto the solid ground of tariff for revenue. Some of the ablest of our tariff-reform leaders think we have not gone far enough in this bill, but we have gone as far as a majority here felt that we could go and remain within our platform declaration for "a gradual reduction to a revenue basis." Philosophy discerns and proclaims absolute perfection. Statesmanship demands the highest degree of perfection which can be secured from collective council and cooperative action in the face of confronting conditions.

I may be permitted to say that most of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee are of the most progressive type, and individually they probably would have gone much further than this bill. We felt, however, that as members of the committee we represented not ourselves but those who had chosen us; that it was our duty to bring in such a bill as a majority of our party in the House would approve, provided always that it should be within the limitations of our platform. We recognized that in union there is strength. We were in daily association with our fellows, and felt that we knew about what they would regard as a fair compliance with the commands of our platform. Having in mind these considerations, we brought in this bill. It did meet with the approval of our party in the House. It does "reduce import duties." It does commence in emphatic form "a gradual reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis." It is a redemption of our platform pledges. What is of vastly more importance, we present a bill which, if enacted into law, would give substantial relief to the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will be withdrawn, and the question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS (from his seat). A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska demands a division.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman who asks for a division did not rise in his seat.

Mr. NORRIS (rising). Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 127.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. All wool, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the following classes:

SEC. 2. Class 1; that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wool, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote; down clothing wools and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castle Branco, Adrianople skin, or butcher's wool; Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood and usually known by the terms herein used; and also hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals; and such wools as have been heretofore imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere; and all wools not hereinafter included in class 2.

SEC. 3. Class 2; that is to say, Donski, native South America, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 4. The standard samples of all wools which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of all wools under this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they may be needed.

SEC. 5. Whenever wool of class 2 shall have been improved by the admixture of merino or English blood from their present character, as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty as class 1.

SEC. 6. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act invoiced or entered as of class 2, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of class 2, shall contain any wool or hair subject to a higher rate of duty, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the rate of duty chargeable on wool of class 1; and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contains any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

SEC. 7. When wool or hair of the first class shall be imported, the duty thereon shall be assessed upon the estimated amount of scoured wool or hair such importation of wool or hair will yield, this amount to be determined by scouring in the regular manner, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may provide. Representative samples of such wool or hair, and the amount of scoured wool or hair derived from such tests, shall be used as a basis to determine the total amount of scoured wool or hair contained in the importation covered by such test. The duty upon the amount of scoured wool or hair thus estimated as contained in such importation shall be 30 cents per pound: Provided, however, That where wool or hair of the first class shall be imported scoured the test herein provided for need not be made, but the duty on such scoured wool shall be 30 cents per pound: And provided further, That the duty upon wool of the first class imported on the skin shall be 26 cents per pound on the estimated amount of scoured wool such wool on the skin will yield when scoured, this amount to be determined by such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may provide.

SEC. 8. On wool of the second class, and on camel's hair of the second class, the duty per pound shall be 6 cents per pound: Provided, That where such wool or hair is imported in a condition for use in carding or spinning into yarns, or which shall contain not more than 8 per cent of dirt or other foreign substance, the duty per pound shall be three times that to which it would otherwise be subjected: And provided further, That the duty on wool of the second class when imported on the skin shall be 1 cent per pound less than when imported not on the skin, the amount of such wool to be determined by such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may provide.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, if the gentleman wishes to speak to his amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in lieu of section 1 of the bill. Section 1 of the bill provides for a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals. Under existing law there are three classifications of the wools referred to in section 1 of the present bill. The difference in the duty on classes 1 and 2 is so slight that it disappears in the classification I have made. For that reason, and also for simplification, I have placed those wools in the first class, and in class 2 the wools described in class 3 in existing law.

My purpose now is to endeavor to demonstrate the appropriateness of and the necessity for this change, and, preliminarily, I wish to express the hope that what I have to submit in the brief time allowed me will be sufficiently convincing to justify the expectation of securing for it some votes in addition to my own. You will remember that when I offered my amendment to strike out the free-meat provision of the bill known as the farmers' free-list bill I was the only Member on this side who voted for it, and I am hopeful that the present result will make it possible to congratulate the country and myself individually that some progress is being made toward desirable and effective legislation.

In making some observations upon this subject I stated, in substance, the other day, that if you had entered into a conspiracy with the wool speculator and importer and had effected a secret agreement with him to pass this bill at this time you could not possibly have better accommodated his wishes nor accomplish a purpose which would more effectively redound to his individual benefit, for I am advised, and I believe authoritatively, that the speculator has, in anticipation of favoring results, put down the price on the wool clipped this spring more than 5 cents per pound, by which he has profited to the extent of some $150,000,000. I have further information from equally credible sources that the prospective deprivation to the farmers of my district—the largest sheep-feeding field of the West—of the opportunity to dispose of their grain and hay for feeding purposes has resulted in a tremendous depreciation in farm values.

These conspicuously serious results, if there were no others, involving disaster to the American sheep producer, should plead "like angels, trumpet-tongued, against the deep damnation" of the passage of the wool provision in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, you know there is always a "black sheep" in every flock, and the sheepman will tell you it is the first one to scent the approaching wolf and nimbly lead its companions to safety. I must naturally assume that I am the ebony one of this flock, and I am frank to concede the motives actuating my associates to be as pure as the fleece of the balance of the flock is white. That they are sagacious and at heart as anxious to escape the crouching, ravenous wolves over there across the aisle goes without saying, and I can only hope they will heed the warning bleat of this "black sheep" and adopt my amendment.

It may be recalled, Mr. Chairman, that on another occasion quite recently I stood almost singly and alone in the midst of my Democratic associates in opposition to the so-called Canadian reciprocity agreement—a Republican administration measure. I did not then, nor do I now, believe that the time has come when the farmers of our country are prepared to engage in a scheme of farming on shares with a people whose patriotism rises to its sublimest heights at the strains of "God save the Queen," and who now so loyally, universally, and filially voice the significant motto, "Long live the King." I recalled the fact that we in this country have never obtained from the people who fly that flag any especially advantageous concessions save those that sprang from the bloody sacrifice of our forebears at Bunker Hill, Brandywine, Valley Forge, Yorktown, and other sanguinary fields.

Mr. Chairman, our national experience should teach us to regard with some suspicion the too ready acceptance of our magnanimous proposition to divide with the whole world the fruits of our great stock-growing business, as was contemplated in the passage of the meat provision of what is familiarly known as the farmers' free-list bill, nor should we permit our eyes to become beclouded in the careful consideration of a kindred measure of equally great concern to the welfare of the farmer and stock grower, such as the one now before the House.

I regard as some recompense at least for my efforts in this behalf the receipt of numerous communications of approval of my position on that subject from the officers of the National Grange, the Farmers' Union, and the American Stock Growers' Association, as well as from the local officers of the various organizations in my State and from innumerable private citizens whose interests are so vitally involved in the fate of this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, because the gentleman is not discussing the point of order which was raised to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves the point of order. The gentleman from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SHARP. In the substitute that the gentleman has proposed I would like to know the relative amount of protection accorded to the woolgrowers over the present tariff.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. On the first-class wools it would be a reduction from 33 cents a pound to 30 cents a pound, and on the second-class wools a reduction from 36 cents to 30 cents, based on the scoured pound.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order. I want to know whether it is well taken, whether or not under this point of order the question of revenue may be discussed and the merits of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is not well taken.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There has been a point of order raised. I did not understand that it was reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. It was reserved.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, reserved. I was under a wrong impression.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the duty would be upon the specific basis—a 30 per cent specific duty upon the first and second class, making no distinction between the two.

I could, if I had the time, possibly interest you more if I traced back the history of the black sheep and told you how, in the first instance, in the natural and economic law there was a necessity for a black sheep at all, and why even to-day that natural and economic law is in force. But time, as I said, will not permit such digression. In my speech of last Saturday in the House I dwelt at length upon the principles underlying this amendment, and those who care to follow the subject further may find that speech in one of the RECORDS of this week. I arose merely to make a short statement explaining the provisions of the amendment.

In suggesting that wool be placed upon a scoured basis for the purpose of levying the duty on that basis I am suggesting the only honest and scientific basis upon which a tariff on wool can or should be levied. Some wools shrink 33 per cent, while other wools shrink 66 per cent; and it therefore must be evidently unfair to the man who imports wool shrinking 66 per cent to charge him the same rate of duty as the man pays who imports wool shrinking but 33 per cent, for in the latter instance the importer of the 33 per cent wool obtains twice as much scoured wool for his duty paid as does the man who imports the 66 per cent wool.

There has grown up a great deal of dissension on account of light-shrinking wool and heavy-shrinking wool. This is but the logical consequence of basing the tariff, either specific or ad valorem, upon the greased pound. And this dissension will exist and grow greater until the matter is equalized by placing the duty solely upon the amount of scoured wool upon which the duty is paid. If the duty is assessed upon the scoured wool that may be contained in an importation, it will not matter to the importer whether it shrinks 30 per cent or 70 per cent, neither will it matter to the woolgrower what foreign wools may shrink when imported.

The wools of this country are sold on a scoured basis—it is absolutely on a scoured basis—and unless the tariff is placed upon the same basis it is impossible for him to know the extent of the competition he must meet.

There may be some who would state that a scoured basis is impracticable and would be unfair to the manufacturer or importer, but I say there never was a pound of wool sold on any other than the scoured basis. In fact, the wool buyer, after determining the quality of the wool, has no other concern except the amount it will shrink when scoured. He is not buying grease and dirt; he is after scoured wool; therefore the price which he is willing to pay must be based upon the amount of scoured wool that the grease wool will yield. Wool in the grease is not made into cloth, and there is no use for the dirt and grease that such wool contains. The average wool buyer can tell within 1 per cent in almost every instance just the amount of scoured wool he will obtain from the grease wool. In fact, at the great wool sales in the West it is a common custom where the man has a clip of 100,000 pounds of wool to open not more than 10 of these sacks, which contain 300 to 400 pounds of grease wool, and to examine that wool with his hand and eye, and from such examination determine the amount of scoured wool it will yield, and on that determination to base the price that may be paid for it.

I am advised from the Wool Yearbook, an English publication, that South American wools are sold upon a scoured basis, and that the commission firms in that country when they offer these wools guarantee to the buyer that a certain wool will yield a certain per cent of scoured wool, and in the event that is does not so yield, the importer or buyer is refunded the difference. This book says that all the Argentina wools are sold on this basis.

Now, much of our wool is purchased in London. Our wool buyers go to the sales in Coleman Street and sample before purchasing the various clips that are to be offered. These small samples they take to what is known as conditioning houses, where they scour the samples, and from that determine the shrinkage of the entire clip. However, many of the buyers are so expert in determining the shrinkage of these wools by a mere examination of them that they do not trouble themselves even to scour samples.

In my amendment there is no occasion for guesswork; it provides for the actual scouring of samples of imported wool. There is no reason why the Government can not as effectively and intelligently scour these samples as can the houses which do so commercially.

The scouring of wool is an extremely simple process. It represents nothing more than a washing out of the dirt and grease, such as wool may contain. The machinery incident to scouring of samples of wool could be placed on a table 4 by 10 feet in size. When the wool has been once washed in a solution largely of soap and water, the single process that remains is the drying of it. This is done by simply passing the wool through the drying machine and removing the excess of moisture.

If we have the weight of the samples that go into the scouring solution, after drying we can take the weight, and we have the amount of scoured wool. The process is almost as simple as washing clothes with the washing machine.

The amendment which I introduce, as you will notice, reduces to some extent the duty upon wool. The present law says that the duty upon a pound of wool of the first class shall be 11 cents and the duty upon a pound of wool of the second class shall be 12 cents. The law assumed and still assumes that these wools shrink 66⅔ per cent, for it immediately proceeds to state that when wools are imported scoured the duty upon wool of the first class shall be three times the duty assessed against it when not scoured, or 33 cents per pound. On wools of the second class when imported scoured the duty shall be three times the duty levied when it is unscoured, or 36 cents. Now, when these wools do shrink 66⅔ per cent, it requires exactly 3 pounds of it to make 1 pound of scoured wool; therefore, the amendment which I introduce reduces the duty on first-class wools from 33 cents a pound to 30 cents a pound, and reduces the duty on second-class wools from 36 cents per pound to 30 cents per pound. This is a material reduction—one which I think will be acceptable to the woolgrowers.

In the speech to which I have referred I demonstrated the fact that the Government has been systematically robbed of its revenue by reason of undervaluation of imports. You will observe that when the duty is based upon the scoured contents of the wool at so much per pound, there is no opportunity for defrauding the Government, and, at the same time, it is a protection to our home woolgrower.

Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes I have allowed me I wish to say that the proponents of this measure base their argument in support of the necessity of a duty at all on wool upon the fact that it will produce revenue. They all agree that under the present law the woolgrower is at least theoretically placed on a competitive basis with the foreign producer, and they are in equal accord in conceding that with the duty under the present bill he is at a disadvantage. They seek to justify themselves for this course by claiming that it is necessary in the passage of tariff laws to do so with a view of accommodating the greatest number. If this view is carried to its logical conclusion it would mean, of course, that wherever one had built up at whatever expense in money and toil an industry in this country, if a foreigner happened to be in a position to produce that thing cheaper than he, then our home citizen must be deprived of it.

But, as I have said, the claim is made that it is necessary to enact the bill for revenue purposes. In the speech to which I refer as having been made by me on last Saturday, I showed there had been carried over from year to year from 1895 to 1908, over and above consumption and exports by the importers and speculators, an average of 370,596,353 pounds of wool, and that now the Government warehouses are bursting their sides with held-over wools, demonstrating that the speculator and importer was not only willing under the present law to pay such duties, but imported that large amount from year to year beyond what was necessary for consumption. In other words, he was willing to and did pay more than $21,000,000 in duties last year, but by the proposed bill is permitted to deprive the Government of the difference between that sum and the $13,000,000 estimated to be collected under the present bill, and to tighten his grasp on the throat of the woolgrower as well as the consumer.

I said in that speech, among other things, that you have sought to convince the people in a nebulous way that the masses would secure some benefit from the lowering of these duties, and I answered by saying that you have not the power to compel the importer to sell his wool at any given price nor the manufacturer his goods. You have simply, as I say, put it in their power to rob the Government in the one case and the consumer in the other; and, more than that, "bear" the price of the woolgrower on his product and ultimately drive him out of the business.

Mr. Chairman, I can not conclude my brief remarks without respectfully and prayerfully inviting the attention of the House to some of the declarations of our party and our party leaders, and hope that it will be borne in mind that we are now considering the very important subjects of reducing tariff rates and how the duties should be levied with the view of equal distribution of burdens.

Let us pause a moment and ask ourselves what was meant by President James K. Polk when he said:

> The term protection to domestic industry is of popular import, but it should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer or planter who toils yearly in his fields is engaged in domestic industry, and he is as much entitled to have his labor protected as others.

Again, what did Andrew Jackson mean when he said:

> The agricultural interest of our country is so essentially connected with every other, and is so superior in importance to them all, that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your attention. * * * The general rule to apply in graduating duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture is that it will place our own in fair competition with those of other countries. * * *

And what did the Democratic platform of 1888 mean when it said:

> Our established domestic industries and enterprises should not and need not be endangered by the reduction and correction of the burdens of taxation. On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operations.

And that of 1896, which was equally impressive in its enunciation:

> The duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country and not distinguish between class or section.

And then in 1904, when it declared that such duties should be—> so levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class, or section, to the end that the burden of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible.

Now, my Democratic friends, let me ask you in all earnestness, in view of these plain, positive, and unequivocal utterances of the great minds of our party, what possible defense can you urge to the people of this country for your undisguised purpose to strike down at a single blow one of our greatest industries, in which over a million people are directly interested? As I have before suggested, it is not claimed that under this present bill the American sheep grower will be afforded fair competition with the foreign grower; and I affirm that by no possible process of analysis is such a demonstration possible.

Mr. Chairman, the fate of the American sheep grower, his well-being, and his best interests are in the keeping of the majority of this body. May they well and truly try the issue and a true deliverance make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order made against this amendment will lie, but as the amendment goes clearly to the first clause of the bill and no other section of the bill, I will not insist, but hope the motion will be voted down as clearly not in accord with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado is so lengthy and involved that it is a little difficult for one to determine from having listened to the reading just what the gentleman proposes, but what I understand his proposition to be is that wool shall be divided into two classes; that the present classes 1 and 2 wools shall constitute class 1, and that wools that are now classified as class 3 wools shall constitute class 2, and, as I understand, on the present class 1 and 2 wools he proposes a duty of 30 cents a pound on the scoured content of the importation. On class 3 he seems to propose a compound duty, which I do not clearly understand.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It is the same; 20 cents a pound on the scoured content.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman informs me he proposes a like duty on the scoured content of class 3 wool. In the speech which I made the other day I expressed the opinion that a specific duty levied on the scoured content of the fleece was the fairest and most equitable of all wool duties, and so I approve the purpose and intent of the gentleman's amendment, though I do not bind myself to the detail of the proposition, for I do not clearly understand it from the reading from the Clerk's desk. As to whether or not the 30-cent per pound duty which he proposes is sufficient, I think it is impossible for us to determine until we shall have secured all the information which the Tariff Board is now collecting. I would prefer not to vote on any amendment to this bill, but rather content myself with voting against it, in view of the fact that the Democratic caucus agreement prevents amendment, and feeling assured the protection which it contains is entirely insufficient, and knowing that in the absence of definite information it is difficult for one to vote intelligently on amendments. However, inasmuch as the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado is based on what I believe to be a wise form of duties on raw wool, and inasmuch as I believe the protection he proposes is perhaps reasonably adequate, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? I wish to say to the gentleman that this amendment, as I am informed, meets with the entire approval of a great majority of the woolgrowers in the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not know whether that may be true or not, Mr. Chairman, but I do know that there are many woolgrowers who believe that the duties should be levied on the scoured content of the fleece, and it seems to me that is an infinitely better form than an ad valorem duty such as is carried in this bill, and a more equitable form of duty than that contained in the present law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado is long and somewhat complex. Just what it provides for I do not understand. It is a good illustration of the need of information to be received from a responsible board before we attempt to vote upon such an amendment, and, not being able to understand it, I shall not vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend, on page 1, lines 10 to 13, by striking out:
> "On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 20 per cent ad valorem."
> And inserting in lieu thereof the following:
> "On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 44.31 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated repeatedly that the object of this bill is to produce more revenue. The amendment I have offered will add $8,000,000 to the revenues of this Government. The truth of this statement is shown by the following table, taken from the committee report, page 65:

Items.	Present act—Results for year ending June 30, 1910.	Proposed act—Estimated results for a 12-month period.

By the statement appearing in the committee report it is shown that the revenues under the present rates on raw wool amount to $21,000,000 per year. It is also shown that under the proposed rates the revenues will amount to $13,000,000 a year. The proposition involved in this amendment is to put the duty upon raw wool exactly as it stands under the present rate, but figured upon an ad valorem basis. At page 27 of the report of the committee it is shown that the average rate on first-class wool reduced to an ad valorem basis under the present law is 47 per cent; on second-class wool it is 46 per cent; and on third-class wool it is 37 per cent, making an average of 44.31 per cent according to the figures of the committee. The portion of the report referred to is as follows:

In the fiscal year 1910 the duties collected on the imports of raw wool amounted to $21,128,728.74. Of this amount $12,289,700.72 was received from wools of class 1, of which the average import value was 23 cents per pound, and on which the average ad valorem equivalent of the duties collected was 47.54 per cent. Class 2 wools yielded $3,212,413.03 in duties, the average import value being 25.9 cents per pound and the average ad valorem equivalent of the duties collected 46.25 per cent. Class 3 wools yielded $5,626,614.99 in duties, the average import value being 12.6 cents per pound and the average ad valorem equivalent of the duties collected 37.79 per cent. On all the raw wools of the three classes the average import value was 18.6 cents per pound, and the average ad valorem equivalent of the duties collected was 44.31 per cent.

I have taken those figures, and I propose in the amendment that the rate shall be retained at that figure. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if this amendment is adopted not only will you subserve the purpose that has been set forth many times in this debate, particularly this morning by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], when he repeated again and again that the object of this bill was to get revenue, but here is an amendment which, if adopted, will save to the Government of the United States $8,000,000 of revenue per year, and at the same time will preserve a great industry which will be ruthlessly stricken down if you pass the bill without the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will say further that this will not defeat the object that gentlemen on that side have in view in cheapening the cost of clothing, because the rate of duty on raw wool has practically no effect upon the price of a suit of clothes. For example, I turn to the committee report, at page 41, and there is given an illustration of the ordinary suit of clothes made of a fabric weighing 9½ ounces to the yard. And then a little bit farther down on the page it says:

It requires 3½ yards of cloth to make a suit.

Well, according to those figures, then, 3½ times 9½ ounces would make approximately 32 ounces, or approximately 2 pounds would be the weight of the woolen cloth in the suit.

Now, on the preceding page of the report, page 40, is set forth the fact that the present basis is 4 pounds of unwashed wool to the pound of cloth, and the committee says, and I think probably they are right in this, that that is too high. The portion of the report referred to is as follows:

The existing rates on scoured wools are based on the supposition that 3 pounds of unwashed wool are required to make 1 pound of scoured, and the compensatory duty on cloth on the supposition that an additional pound of unwashed wool, or one-third more of the scoured contents, is required in going on through the manufacture of 1 pound of cloth. This appears to be an excessive allowance for either woolen or worsted cloth in general.

If it takes 4 pounds of raw wool to make a pound of cloth, then by the most liberal estimate, and an estimate which the committee itself says is too high, you have 8 pounds of wool entering into a suit of clothes. And figuring on the present basis, the amount of duty would be only 88 cents, and, as a matter of fact, that is too high. It ought not to be figured, perhaps, more than 3 pounds, and that would make the amount of duty 66 cents on a suit of clothes. Now, does anyone suppose that if you take the tariff off this wool that the tailor is going to sell a $15 or $20 suit of clothes at a reduction in price of 66 cents?

In view of the fact that to-day's statement of the Treasury Department shows that the Treasury is more than $70,000,000 better off than it was one year ago, there is no foundation for the claim made on that side that there is immediate financial necessity for this legislation.

But if more revenue were needed, as is claimed by the committee, then this amendment I have offered should prevail, because while saving from destruction the great woolgrowing and sheep-raising industry of the country, it at the same time will increase the annual revenues under this proposed measure $8,000,000 without increasing the price of clothing one penny to any American consumer. As it is now, the American farmer gets less than $1.30 for the wool that goes into a suit of woolen clothes.

If all the tariff on wool were added to the price of the manufactured article, it would not amount to 75 cents on an all-wool suit of clothes. Does anyone think that under free wool a $20 suit of clothes would sell for $19.25? Certainly not! The manufacturer might gain by getting his wool cheaper temporarily, but the consumer would have to pay the same for woolen clothing as before (if under this Democratic plan of destruction he shall have anything to buy with), and at the same time the industry of woolgrowing and sheep raising in the United States will be annihilated. In the name of 75,000 woolgrowers and farmers in Ohio I plead for the adoption of this amendment.

I submit a statement by S. W. McClure, secretary of National Woolgrowers' Association:

IN REALITY NO PROTECTION AT ALL.

If the House passes its bill placing the duty on fleece wool at 20 per cent, this will give the growers an actual protection against foreign wools of from 2 to 3 cents per pound, which, in reality, is no protection at all. Since the Democrats assess the duty on the value of the imported wools, it necessarily follows that only the lower grade of wools will be imported, for the duty on them will be less than on the higher quality of wools. In other words, this tariff encourages the importations of poor wools.

Wool can be grown in Australia, South America, and Africa for considerably less than half of what it costs to produce it in this country. Therefore, without adequate protection, our growers will soon be driven out of the sheep business, and if this Democratic wool bill should pass the value of American sheep will shrink $150,000,000 in less than five years.

OVER A MILLION WOOLGROWERS.

The census of 1900 showed 765,000 woolgrowers in the United States, and the next census should show over 1,000,000 individual growers. You can not bring financial distress to 1,000,000 American farmers without disturbing in a large degree the commercial progress of the country. The sheep of the United States are valued at $233,000,000, and the lands upon which they feed are valued at $300,000,000 more. Thus, the sheep industry represents an investment of $533,000,000. Is this to be destroyed purely in the interest of political expediency?

We have in the United States, according to Government figures, over 57,000,000 sheep that last year produced 330,000,000 pounds of wool. Under the present tariff law the sheep of the United States have increased 49½ per cent in number and 248 per cent in value in the past 14 years. In addition to this increase, we slaughtered last year 15,000,000 mutton that had a powerful influence in keeping down the price of other foods.

NO INFLUENCE ON THE PRICE OF CLOTHING.

The tariff on wool has never had any influence on the price of clothing, and everyone understands this who has taken the pains to investigate it.

An all-wool suit of clothing which you buy from your dealer for $40, or from the store for $25, if of the usual summer weight, contains, if it be all wool, just 7½ pounds of wool as it comes from the sheep. For fine merino wool our growers now receive about 16 cents per pound; and figuring 8 pounds to the suit, it would make the wool that went to make a $40 suit of clothes cost just $1.28. That is all the woolgrower gets out of the suit, in spite of the tariff. You can figure this out for yourself. The average suit of clothes requires 3½ yards of cloth; the cloth weighs from 10 to 16 ounces per yard. There are very few suits of clothes, regardless of what they may sell for, that the woolgrower gets as much as $2 for furnishing all the wool that goes into them. At present prices it is almost impossible to put $2 worth of wool in a summer suit. The value of the wool contained in the suit is so small that it is never a factor in regulating the price for which the suit must be sold.

WHAT IT HAS SAVED THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

The tariff on wool has saved the American people hundreds of millions of dollars, for it has built up in this Nation a sheep industry that furnishes our people annually with 330,000,000 pounds of the best wool in the world. American wool is superior to any imported wool, and clothing made from it will wear from 25 to 60 per cent longer than cloth made from similar grades of foreign wool. The only reason for using foreign wool in our clothes is that it may be purchased cheaper than domestic wool. Australia and South America recognize the superiority of the American wool-producing sheep, and in many instances they have purchased from us sheep for the improvement of their foreign flocks. I have been told by manufacturers and wool experts, men who have spent a lifetime in the business, that foreign wools, as imported, do not compare with ours in wearing quality. Our Government recognizes this fact, and in letting contracts for woolen clothing for both Army and Navy specifies that nothing but American wool shall be used in their manufacture.

The woolgrowers of the Nation only ask for a square deal. They have indorsed the idea of a Tariff Board to ascertain the difference in cost of producing wool in this and foreign countries. The representative of the Tariff Board has gone to the home of the woolgrowers and has been welcomed there in an endeavor to obtain the true facts as they relate to the sheep industry. The Tariff Board has sent expert accountants to many of the sheep ranches, who have gone over the books of the sheepmen in a very careful manner. This board will report its findings to the American people next December, and the woolgrowers only ask that action upon the wool tariff shall be delayed until this report makes it possible for Congress to know just what protection our sheepmen are entitled to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That H. R. 11019, the same being a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, be amended by striking out all in lines 10 to 13, inclusive, on page 1, and being paragraph 1 of section 1 therein, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"1. All wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and all other like animals, and all wool and hair on the skins of such animals, when imported into the United States, shall be exempt from duty."

And that the remaining paragraphs of section 1 of said bill be recommitted to the Ways and Means Committee with instructions to amend the same by reducing the duties on manufactures of wool to an average of 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, certain charges have been made here against the Democratic caucus by the two honorable gentlemen from the State of Illinois [Mr. MANN and Mr. CANNON], and also on the floor of this House by certain other gentlemen. But I take no exceptions to the charges, nor the criticisms from insurgent Republicans, because these men are consistent and practice what they preach, but I do take exceptions to the charges from these other men, because they are inconsistent and they do not practice what they preach. They say nothing against the procedure of their own caucus, and I take it that a man who has not the moral courage to denounce a bad thing in his own party has no standing to make charges against and criticize his opposing party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These gentlemen have never been in a Democratic caucus, and they are evidently judging a Democratic caucus from the proceedings of a Republican caucus.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the point of order.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is responsive to the criticism from these men.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope my colleague [Mr. MADDEN] will not insist upon his point of order. Let the gentleman from Indiana proceed.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair has not acted upon the point of order that is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] will continue.

Mr. GRAY. What I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman, was that these men are judging our caucus by their own caucus, and from their charges certainly a Republican caucus must be bristling with the gag rule, shrieking with the strains of the steam roller, and doleful with the wails of the crushed. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, such is not the proceedings of a Democratic caucus. I am a member of the Democratic caucus, and believe that I am in good standing, and yet under the rules of that caucus I am permitted to stand here on this floor and make a motion to amend the bill reported at the caucus and to move this House to place wool on the free list and reduce the duties upon manufactured wool to an average rate of 20 per cent ad valorem, and I am free to vote for any and all amendments which, in my judgment, I may see fit to support. So I say to these gentlemen that their criticisms are not well taken.

Mr. Chairman, along with the tariff on woolen clothing, behind which the woolen manufacturers have intrenched themselves for 50 years to exact millions in tribute annually from the people, there is a tariff on raw wool, placed there and kept there at the demands of the woolen manufacturers themselves. And while this tariff would have the effect, if allowed to operate, to increase the cost of the manufacturers' raw material, yet we are confronted with the spectacle of the woolen manufacturers, their agents, attorneys, and special representatives entreating and imploring Congress to allow the tariff on wool to remain, and to permit them to continue the payment of a tax on their raw material. Why have the woolen manufacturers thus demanded, and why are they still demanding, a tariff upon wool and asking to be permitted to continue the payment of this tax? Let no man be deceived in their purpose. It is a stratagem to gain the woolgrowers' support for a tariff upon manufactured wool, to blind him with self-interest, to make him a party to the crime of extortion, and to close his mouth against the evils of private monopoly and the exploitation of the consumers of woolen clothing.

Monopoly and extortion never ask in their own name, but always for and in the name of others. The woolen manufacturers' demand for a tariff upon wool is a subterfuge to claim a tariff for themselves on manufactured wool under the name of the woolgrowers. It is to disguise the Wool Trust in the cloak of the shepherd to deceive the people and decoy them to support a tariff on woolen clothing.

And the woolen manufacturers can well afford to make this bargain with the woolgrowers, for the manufacturers do not live up to their promise to divide the tribute collected off of the people. But if the manufacturers did so divide with the woolgrowers they would only have to add any increase in price of wool they paid to the price of their cloth and collect it back off of the consumers, and would make the woolgrowers pay their own tribute.

During the last 13 years the tariff upon Indiana one-fourth blood wool, unwashed, has been 11 cents per pound, and yet the average Boston price for these years has been less than 4 cents per pound above the London market for the same class of wool, and in 1903 the price was only 3½ cents higher, in 1907 only 3¼ cents higher, in 1906 only 4 cents higher, in 1908 only 1½ cents higher, and in 1910 only 1 cent higher per pound in the Boston market over the foreign price at London. The reason for this is plain. The farmers and woolgrowers have never been able to organize and cooperate to hold their product, while the woolen manufacturers have long been combined as a trust, and thus acting as one buyer they offer the woolgrower whatever price they determine to pay in directors' meeting, and the woolgrower has to take it.

While the tariff of 11 cents per pound remained the same during all these years, the price of wool fluctuated with each year. If the tariff had been the controlling factor in fixing the price of wool and the measure of that price, as the woolen manufacturers promised the woolgrowers it would be, the price of domestic wool would have been maintained uniformly 11 cents higher than the foreign markets. The tariff was always to control the price of wool before the election, but the Woolen Manufacturers' Trust has been the potent factor of control after the election.

But this is not all. While the woolgrowers have been induced to support a tariff upon woolens on the promise of being allowed to share in the tribute exacted from the consumers of woolen clothing, the woolen manufacturers have been collecting an average tariff tax of 90 per cent off of the American people, including the woolgrowers themselves, amounting, as variously estimated from official figures, from $175,000,000 to $200,000,000 annually.

The value of the manufactured wool produced in the United States for 1909, with imports added and less exports, leaving the amount consumed in the United States for that year, was $530,862,522. Taking the average tariff rates of the Dingley and Payne laws at 90 per cent, as officially ascertained, it is found that the enhanced price of manufactured woolens which the consumers are compelled to pay on account of the tariff, is the sum of $251,461,247. Deducting from this amount the amount of revenues collected from imports on woolens leaves the amount paid to the woolen manufacturers as increased price by reason of the tariff $228,403,890. And for the purpose of illustration, conceding that the woolen manufacturers had lived up to their promise to divide the tribute collected off of the American people on the basis of 11 cents per pound of wool on the amount of wool produced that year in the United States, 323,110,749 pounds, and amounting to $36,092,182, the woolen manufacturers were safe in making the bargain, even if the woolgrowers could have held them to the trade, for they would have still been collecting off of the people $215,279,461 more than they had obligated themselves to pay out to the woolgrowers to secure their support of the 90 per cent tariff upon manufactures of wool.

While under this promise to divide profits with the woolgrower, and while the American people have been paying, at a most conservative estimate, from $175,000,000 to $200,000,000 annually to stimulate and encourage the sheep industry, the number of sheep in Indiana, as shown by the bureau of statistics of that State, has declined from 832,856 in 1900 to 710,238 in 1909, and the wool clip from 4,537,975 pounds in 1900 to 3,939,168 pounds in 1909.

The woolen manufacturers tell us the excessive tariff of the Payne bill is to protect the woolgrower. Assuming the roll of philanthropist, they say they appear not in their own interest, but only to guard the welfare of others. This plea of defending others is a subterfuge as old as history. It is a pretext to hide and cover up that which can not be openly defended. Every man who has enslaved another man has enslaved him under the claim of charity and benevolence for the enslaved. Every nation which has conquered another people to exact tribute from them has entered upon its campaign of subjugation under the pretense of improving and bettering the state of the subjugated. Every imposition heaped upon one man by another by and through deceptive forms of legislation has been heaped upon him under the pretense of protection and safeguarding the welfare of the burdened. Oh, farmer and woolgrower, what crimes are committed in thy name!

To say nothing of the interests of the consuming public, the time is at hand for the inauguration of a new commercial policy. The growth of our manufacturing interests will hereafter not be measured by a monopolized, exclusive market at home, but by the development of a broad open market abroad. Our industries, even from the most selfish and mercenary standpoint, must no longer seek to profit by protection against the world's markets, but must prepare to meet open competition and conquer by merit and policy of commerce.

The merits of free raw material have been denied in this debate as a tariff-reform measure. Manufacturers must be free to produce from crude products and raw materials of the earth and to sell them without restriction from retaliatory tariff barriers and in the freedom of open trade, if we demand they sell at home as cheap as abroad.

While we are denying the right to give manufacturers undue advantage of monopoly, it is not the purpose to place them at a disadvantage, but only to remove an artificial industrial basis and furnish a merit foundation. It is the purpose to compensate them for the loss of a limited exclusive market based upon monopoly by giving an enlarged and world market, and to change the system of profits from extortion to profits by increased production and volume of business.

Taxing raw material gives foreign manufacturers an advantage, and affords the foreign manufacturer an actual protection against competition from the home manufacturer, and gives the home manufacturer at once a standing from which to plead for a high compensatory tariff, and an apology for discriminating against the home consumer.

After the woolen manufacturers have made a plea for and secured a tariff placed upon raw wool, they adroitly add:

"American woolen manufacturers demand no reduction in the duty on raw material; they only ask that they shall continue to be sufficiently compensated for the increased cost of raw material to protect them from the lower price at which foreign manufacturers are able to obtain their wool."—Julius Forstmann, president of Forstmann & Huffmann Co., woolen manufacturers, Passaic, N. J., in a pamphlet addressed to Members of Congress during this debate on the wool schedule.

And having once justified their claim on the grounds of compensation for the duty paid by them on raw wool, and still claiming for the woolgrower, the manufacturers assume the right to fix the limit of the compensatory duty and make it prohibitory, all in the name of charity and benevolence for the woolgrower. And as long as the woolen manufacturers can plead protection under the name of the woolgrowers they can not only hold the allegiance of the woolgrowers by dangling before their eyes a division of tribute to be exacted from the people, but can use the woolgrower as a decoy to secure the support of the woolgrowers' unsuspecting friends.

Give our manufacturers free raw wool and the right to produce from the open markets of the world, and you take away the delusive claim adroitly made for a compensatory tariff and the right to dictate the limit of the protection thus justified.

Give our manufacturers an equal footing and basis of production from free raw wool with foreign manufacturers and you remove from them the basis for the delusive plea of compensatory duties, without which there can be no pretext of justification for selling higher at home than abroad. The raw-material rebate clause is a crafty device to reach out in the world's market while holding monopoly intact at home.

Our manufacturers themselves are to-day recognizing the growing necessity of a broad world market and increased sales, with profits based upon a greater volume of business than upon monopoly and exclusive sales in a limited market, and they are likewise beginning to appreciate the benefit of an equal basis of production resulting from free raw material enjoyed by manufacturers abroad. The proposed Canadian reciprocal agreement comes from the manufacturing interests as an effort to extend their markets abroad, and is the one first step which will lead to many more until greater freedom and extension in commerce is attained. While the reciprocal agreement standing alone is not fair to the interests of the consumer, the free-list measure lately passed by this House makes the consumer and manufacturer walk hand in hand in the enjoyment of a greater and more unrestricted trade.

Along with our pledges to revise the tariff is the promise to levy the lowest duties upon necessaries and the highest upon luxuries and nonessentials. While sharing the highest regard for the opposing views of my colleagues, as supported by the almost unanimous judgment of the caucus, and appreciating the weight of the able argument advanced for a compromise ground to insure united support for the bill, yet, as I construe our position, the excessive and exorbitant duties of the wool schedule under the Payne law should be still further reduced, and to an average duty of not to exceed 20 per cent ad valorem, with the highest rates laid upon luxuries of dress and the lowest upon the common essentials of comfort; and to avoid the claim and argument from manufacturers of compensatory duties, wool should be made duty free. The deficiency of revenue thereby resulting can be made up by a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem imposed upon rough diamonds, raw silk, and india rubber, now duty free under the Republican free list.

On the basis of importations of manufactured wool for the year ending June 30, 1910, and valued at $23,057,357.78, at 20 per cent duty the revenue derived would be $4,611,471.55. The importation of rough diamonds and precious stones for the same year ending were of the value of $10,557,800, which, at 20 per cent duty, would yield a revenue of $2,111,560. The value of the imports of raw silk for that period was $67,129,603, and upon which a 20 per cent duty would bring into the Treasury $13,425,920, and the imports of crude rubber and substitutes were in the sum of $106,851,475, which, at 20 per cent duty, would produce $21,372,295, or, in all, making a total revenue upon the basis of importations for said year of $41,521,246.55, with 20 per cent duty on woolens, and raw wool on the free list. The duties collected under the Payne law for the year ending June 30, 1910, with a tariff of 44 per cent duty upon raw wool and an average duty of 90 per cent on woolens were $41,904,549.50. The duties estimated for the pending bill, with 20 per cent duty on raw wool and 42.55 per cent duty upon manufactured wool, with imports estimated at $63,831,000, are $40,556,200.

The iniquities of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law are observed by a mere glance at the wool schedule, disclosing exorbitant and excessive rates of duty imposed. The rates upon many of the items of this schedule are prohibitory, and the people are left without the semblance of protection from competition. Yarns under 30 cents per pound in value are taxed 159.75 per cent; blankets valued at not more than 50 cents per pound are taxed 105.50 per cent; cloth valued at not more than 40 cents per pound is taxed 144.05 per cent; dress goods valued at not above 70 cents per pound are taxed 103.75 per cent; flannels weighing over 4 ounces to the yard and valued at less than 70 cents per pound are taxed 121.62 per cent. The present bill under consideration of the House reduces the duties by more than one-half. The duty on yarn is fixed at 30 per cent; on cloth and knit fabrics, 40 per cent; on blankets and flannels, 30 to 45 per cent; with corresponding reductions upon other items.

This bill is a good bill, but it would be a much better bill if it carried out further the principle of levying the lowest taxes upon necessaries and the highest upon luxuries and nonessentials by reducing the tariff on manufactures of wool to an average of 20 per cent and taxing rough diamonds, raw silk, and crude rubber. It would be a much better bill if it invaded the Republican free list and levied a tax upon raw materials that enter into the production of luxuries and nonessentials and placed wool used in the manufacture of a vital necessity on the free list instead. It would be a better bill if it took away from the Wool Trust the vantage ground of a tariff on wool from which to recruit support through delusive promises of gain to the woolgrower from the helpless consumer under stifled competition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. I join in that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana be allowed five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GRAY. I thank the gentleman. A tariff on raw wool, if allowed to remain, will nullify the doctrine of free necessaries, furnish an argument to restore the duties on lumber and hides, call a halt to the further extension of the free list in the vital necessaries of life, and destroy the only principle under which the people can hope for relief from tariff exactions—the principle that the taxing power can only be lawfully invoked for public purposes.

If we want to be free from the burdens of an excessive tariff, if we want relief from private monopoly, if we want to escape tribute to the special interests, we must first ourselves renounce the right to levy taxes for private purposes. We can not invoke relief under a principle while we deny and violate it ourselves.

If we believe in serving the greatest good to the greatest number, if we subscribe to the policy of equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none, if we hold the common welfare above private gain, if we adhere to the doctrine that a private monopoly is intolerable and indefensible, we can not vote for a protective tariff upon one of the vital necessaries of life and justify ourselves upon the grounds of loyalty to local private interests.

The tariff is more than a local question. It is a selfish question, a question in which the selfish interests of the few are always clamoring to prevail over the welfare of the many. Whenever we open the door to private selfish interests we break the ranks of unity and good faith to the public, and no congressional district will be found so poor, so barren, or so unproductive that its Representative in Congress can not justify the desertion of principle by claiming the right to favor local private industry.

But they tell us from the other side that a high tariff is to protect our labor from competition with labor abroad, that if we lower the tariff foreign labor, now hungry and starving, will take our work and home labor will be idle. I deny that the welfare of our labor is dependent upon the downfall of foreign labor. I deny that it is necessary for foreign labor to perish that our labor shall prosper. I deny that it is necessary for the labor of other lands to be destitute in order for our labor to be fed and clothed and sheltered. I repudiate that doctrine. While there is a difference in the standard of living, there is a corresponding difference in capacity to produce in favor of American labor equalizing the wage scale, and I hold that, in many substantial matters, labor here and labor abroad have a common interest, a common cause, and a common object to obtain. I hold that the downfall of labor in one country has the effect to jeopardize the welfare of labor in every other country. I hold that the elevation of labor in one land has an influence to raise the standard and sustain the independence of labor everywhere. I hold that this effort to prejudice American labor against their brothers across the seas is only to divide the forces of industry and make them the easy prey of rapacious greed. The employer who sounds this alarm against foreign labor with hue and cry so loses his fears and apprehensions when he fails to agree with home labor on the wage scale that he imports foreigners to take their places.

Statistics from the Census Bureau, as ascertained by the Tariff Board and shown in its preliminary report, discloses that woolen and worsted goods were produced in the United States in 1909 of the value of $419,826,000, while the total wages paid, including salaries, for such production was $79,214,000, or less than 19 per cent of the value of the production, and more accurately stated at 18.79 per cent. If labor is performed gratuitously to produce woolen and worsted goods abroad and costs nothing, and the whole labor cost here is the difference in labor cost here and abroad, a 20 per cent duty upon woolen and worsted goods, with wool on the free list, would be more than a compliance with the standard which the protectionists declared for before the elections—a tariff to equalize the difference in the labor cost. Under these statistics what justification can there be for the 90 per cent duty on woolen goods in the Payne bill without resort to the pretext for compensatory duties on account of the tariff upon wool.

Now, shall I have five minutes more? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman may have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY. Members of this House are elected not only to represent their own districts especially, but all districts generally as well. It is their duty to serve not only the greatest good to the greatest number in their own districts, but to consider the greatest good to the greatest number in all districts.

No duty is enjoined upon Members of this House by reason of their office to burden not only the majority of their own constituents but the whole of the great consuming public in order to favor a few individuals or a single private industry in their own district. Such a policy is representing the few instead of the many and serving private interests at the expense of public welfare. There never can be relief from the burdens of the tariff while men are willing to surrender principle to favor local private interests. Whenever we claim the right to impose a protective tariff upon one of the necessaries of life because that article is produced in our congressional district we stultify our principles and justify like burdens imposed upon every other necessary. We preclude tariff reform and perpetuate private monopoly.

I, too, come from a woolgrowing district, but I hope that that fact will not deter me from my duty to serve the greatest good to the greatest number, nor impair my obligations to all the people and the great consuming public, nor lead me to act upon my fears instead of my convictions of justice and right. I hope I can realize that while a part of the people of my district have wool to sell that all the people from my district have clothing to buy, and that the right to buy clothing is as sacred a right as the right to sell wool. And I hope I can appreciate that the laboring man, when he looks into the faces of his wife and children, with winter impending, realizes as great a responsibility before him as the man who raises sheep or the wool manufacturer, who claims the right to draw dividends on watered stock. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order. A part of the motion is a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. GRAY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in order to make this motion effective, if the gentleman from Alabama insists upon his point of order, I have an amendment here that I can file to this paragraph, which amendment will not be subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 1 by striking out all of the paragraph following the word "animals," in line 12, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "25 cents per pound on the basis of scoured wool, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such provisions as may be necessary to determine the quantity of scoured wool contained in all wool that may be imported."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, just a few words upon the amendment that I have proposed. I will say that I have let the language of the bill stand, in so far as possible, so far as this particular paragraph is concerned. My amendment calls for the striking out of the words "20 per cent ad valorem."

I have proposed this amendment—to strike out that part of the paragraph—because I believe that the ad valorem basis for a duty upon wool is a wrong basis. It is wrong from the revenue point of view because you have no certainty of the amount of revenue that can be collected from one year to another. It is absolutely false from the standpoint of protection because the very times when the producers of wool need protection most they have the least protection, and when they need protection least they have the greater protection.

I have proposed that the basis be specific, and that it be 25 cents per pound upon scoured wool. Under the present law the duty rests upon the basis of wool in the grease, requiring theoretically something like 3 pounds of wool in the grease to make 1 pound of scoured wool; or, in other words, theoretically a protection of 33 cents a pound upon scoured wool.

This amendment proposes that it shall be 25 cents per pound upon that basis, and removes the opportunity for the great wrong that has been made possible, as I see it, by figuring the protection upon the basis of wool in the grease. We all know that wool is imported into this country having a shrinkage of 12 per cent, 15 per cent, and as high as 50 per cent; and while the wool from my State shrinks 67 per cent, very little wool is imported from foreign countries that has a shrinkage of that amount. This amendment then, if it prevails, will provide a basis that will be absolutely fair to the grower of wool, absolutely fair to the manufacturer, because he will know just exactly what he is importing, and it will be absolutely fair to the country at large, because it will be easily understood, and there can be no opportunity, as I see it, for a wrong to exist in the importation of wool under the guise of a protection that rests upon a wrong basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert before the word "goat," in line 10, page 1, the word "Angora."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment is an endeavor to relieve the gentlemen on the other side, and particularly the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who seemed a little while ago to be in a hole. The bill H. R. 11019 provides in the paragraph now under discussion that "on the wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty thereof shall be 20 per cent ad valorem."

The Payne tariff law, which has come in for so much criticism, provides in section 583 that there shall be on the free list the "hair of the horse, camel, and other animals, cleaned or uncleaned, drawn or undrawn, but unmanufactured and not specially provided for in this section, and human hair uncleaned and not drawn."

Now, Mr. Chairman, our friends on the other side are making appeals in behalf of the consumer who uses manufactured products that come from raw material furnished by wool producers. They claim that the reduction of the tariff will reduce the cost of living to the consumer, and particularly the cost of clothing. Here we have an illustration of how an attempted reduction of duty works with respect to the consumer, and also with regard to the wool producers for whom fervent appeals have been made on the other side.

The Payne tariff law actually placed on the free list these various wools and hairs to which I have referred in section 583. These materials very largely affect those commodities which the consumer, for whom our friends on the other side appeal, uses. They enter into the manufacture of clothing.

The bill bearing the name of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], proposes to let these raw materials, which help to provide cheap clothing, and which are put on the free list of the Payne bill—proposes to put against these commodities a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem. It seems to me that this is a hole from which the gentleman on the other side should be extricated, and I offer the amendment in order that such a remedy may eventuate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the bill was not written for protection but for the purpose of raising revenue. The hair that the gentleman refers to is used for horse blankets. It was proposed by some that we refuse to tax third-class wool because it was not competitive wool, and only levy the tax on the first and second class wools that were competitive wools. I can see very readily how a Republican could levy a tax that way because he is legislating for protection, but when we levy a tax on certain classes of articles for the purpose of raising revenue, it is not within our function to discriminate between levying a tax on goat's hair that is used for horse blankets and goat's hair used for clothes. I think the amendment ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following after the last word in line 13, page 1: "Provided, That when under existing law, or any law hereinafter enacted, it shall be finally determined by any court, board, commission, or other competent and legal authority, having jurisdiction in such cases, that any article or articles hereinafter mentioned enter into competition with trust-controlled products, then the said article or articles when so imported shall thereafter be admitted free of duty until such time as said article or articles shall cease to enter into competition with trust-controlled products."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentleman will withhold his point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to gentlemen on that side if they want to discuss this wool bill I am willing to let this debate run on, but if they propose to offer amendments and to discuss questions that are not in line with the bill before this House I shall move to close debate.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to have five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered to section 1 of this bill is as follows:

Provided, however, That when under existing law, or any law hereafter enacted, it shall be finally determined by any court, board, commission, or other competent and legal authority having jurisdiction in such cases, that any article or articles hereinafter mentioned enter into competition with trust-controlled products, then the said article or articles when so imported shall thereafter be admitted free of duty until such time as said article or articles shall cease to enter into competition with trust-controlled products.

A point of order was made against the amendment, and the point of order has been sustained. Without questioning the correctness of the ruling of the Chair, I want to state briefly why such an amendment was offered.

The Democratic national platform of 1908, in the paragraph relating to the tariff, contains the following:

We favor the immediate revision of the tariff. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list.

Mr. Chairman, here is a plain, definite, specific, certain, and positive declaration by the Democratic Party in the national platform that "articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list."

If this promise made by the Democratic Party is to be carried out, there is only one way it can be done and that is to first ascertain, before revising a schedule of the present tariff law, whether or not the articles in that schedule or any of them "enter into competition with trust-controlled praducts." If it shall, as a preliminary fact, be ascertained that the articles are in competition with trust-controlled products, then unless these articles are placed on the free list the Democratic majority in this House violates the pledge in the platform.

In support of this bill the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee has submitted a lengthy report, consisting of nearly 300 pages. But there is no information in that report as to whether or not any of the articles included in Schedule K, or the woolen schedule, are trust-controlled products. Yet, if this schedule is to be revised in harmony with the declaration in the Democratic platform, the most important information of all is whether or not these articles, or any of them, are trust-controlled products. I am sure, for one, that I would like to have this information. I would like to know whether the articles involved are the products of a trust or are manufactured by factories in free competition with each other. It has been charged in this debate that the American Woolen Co. is a trust. But this matter has not been ascertained by any authority with power or jurisdiction to act. But you propose to pass this bill without any effort on your part to ascertain the facts, and by so doing you are ignoring your platform and violating your promises to the people. For in this bill you announce that you have fixed the schedule of rates solely with a view to raising the largest amount of revenue, and lose sight entirely of whether or not any of these articles are controlled by a trust.

Of all the great questions before the American people to-day, the most important of all is the proper regulation and control of our great industrial corporations, commonly known as trusts. I do not myself think that these corporations can be controlled or regulated by the adjustment of the tariff on the articles they manufacture. But in amending the present tariff law, and in determining the degree of protection allowed, I for one would certainly take in consideration the matter of the competition at home. I would not only exercise great care to protect properly every industry in which there is free competition at home, but would exercise equally as great care to see that undue encouragement, aid, and assistance were not given to industries that would be classified as trusts or monopolies.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Would the gentleman vote to put steel and all steel commodities on the free list?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not in advance say how I will vote on any bill to amend the tariff law, because every bill involves so many propositions. But when these bills shall be presented from time to time, I shall give them my earnest and conscientious attention and vote as I think will best serve the business interests of this country, provide employment at good wages for the laboring men of the Nation, and promote alike the welfare of both producers and consumers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for two minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. On all noils, top waste, card waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, bur waste, thread waste, garnetted waste, shoddies, mungo, flocks, wool extract, carbonized wool, carbonized noils, and on all other wastes and on rags composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 3, by striking out the word "shoddies."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 5, by striking out the words "on rags composed wholly or in part of wool."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 6, by striking out the words "in this act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.
Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to paragraph 2.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the words "ad valorem," in line 6, page 2, the following: "Provided, That all combed wool or tops, made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair, shall be admitted free of duty."

Mr. MURDOCK. This is one of four amendments I wish to offer to the bill, amendments seeking to bring in free of duty certain products in the manufacture of wool. The first, the one just offered, relates to tops, and if I can have the indulgence of the House I desire to point out to the members of the committee just how the manufacturing processes of woolens and worsteds are distinct. The raw wool is first beaten and cleaned of certain dirt and burs. Then it is washed, then it is dried, and then it is chemically treated.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; not right at this point of my explanation.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on which his explanation must be based.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, no; I will say to the gentleman I want to go ahead with my explanation first.

Mr. HILL. But your explanation is based on a false theory.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, well, I will say to the gentleman he may say it is false before I finish, but he might better hear me first. After the raw wool has been chemically treated it has had its last cleaning. Then the wool takes one or two roads, according to whether it is going to be worsted or woolen. If it takes the worsted track, it is first combed, and in the combing process the short fibers are taken out and become the nolls. The remaining product is the tops. Now, the process of combing is of laying the fibers of the wool parallel. If the wool takes the woolen road, the process is carding, which is not combing. In combing the fibers are laid parallel. In carding they are intermingled by means of a carder, which is a large central cylinder known as a "swift," which is surrounded by smaller cylinders which take on and off these wool fibers and thoroughly intermingle them. Now, the two products resulting are entirely different and distinct. The worsted is a wide sliver of fibers, all laid parallel; the woolen, however, is a long sliver or ribbon of wool fibers thoroughly intermingled. Now, it happens that wool has this peculiarity over other hairs in the world. It is serrated, has a scale-like surface, and when the wool fibers are thoroughly intermingled they have the quality of felting, of matting. So these worsteds and woolens are completely distinct. Now, the next step is the making of the yarn. Here the process is entirely distinct and the product resulting distinct as well. In woolens the yarn is made by a draft or extension of the material by a spindle, the spindle giving an alternating draft as it draws the woolen thread toward it and gives it its twist. Now, the worsted process is this: The worsted yarn starts in with a large run of fiber between a series of rolls, each succeeding set of rolls going more rapidly than the set preceding it, with the result that the fiber of the wool passes between the rolls, which run the fiber thin; and while the fiber is still running and being drawn out under the heavy draft it is given a twist by the spindle.

So that you have on the one hand a loosely twisted yarn, woolen, and a hard-twisted yarn, worsted. And if you will take the microscope and examine first the woolen you will find a soft, pliable thread, which apparently is covered with a fringe, and if you will take a worsted thread and subject it to the same examination——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. When you examine the worsted thread under the microscope you find it hard, compact, and apparently without a cover. Here we have two distinct products, and yet in all tariff measures in recent years—that is, since the Civil War—there has been apparently no distinction observed between the two when it came to writing the wool schedule. They have been called indiscriminately woolens and worsteds. It is the most difficult thing in the world to get figures either in the census, in the statistical abstract, or in any of the reports of our various boards which will show illuminating statistics differentiating between the woolen and the worsted production. But if anyone in this House will read the hearings held on the Dingley bill, in the first instance, and on the Payne bill in the second, he will find that in this country throughout the years the woolen industry—that is, the industry which uses the soft, pliable yarn—has been going down and the worsted industry has been going up, with the result that to-day, in spite of all denial, the worsted interest in this country controls the markets so far as suitings for men and women are concerned. And inside the worsted interest, I want to emphasize to the gentlemen of this committee, is the American Woolen Co., and the facts that I related about the American Woolen Co. the other day are just as I stated them, and were given after long study and careful research. If the gentlemen here will read, as I have read, the textile journals of America week by week as they are published, if gentlemen will go down on Wall Street and talk to the informed financial interests there, if they will go home to their retail traders and talk with them, they will find beyond doubt that, whether the American Woolen Co. produces 20, 30, or 40 per cent of the worsted suitings of this country, it controls the market. Is there anyone here who thinks that the American Sugar Refining Co. controls 50 per cent of the refined sugar in this country? Do the gentlemen here realize that there are about 98 oil refineries in this country and only 23 of them are owned by the Standard Oil Co.? Do the gentlemen here believe that the United States Steel Co. makes over 50 per cent of American steel rails? Does anyone here contend that a given industry must control a majority of the units of that industry in order to control the market? No one here will so contend.

You have in America, whether you on the other side have investigated it or not, and whether you pigeonhole the resolutions asking for an investigation of the Woolen Trust, which are before your Committee on Rules, you have a Worsted Trust, and you have a chance in this bill by making tops free, by making worsted yarns free, by making men's worsted suitings and women's dress goods made of worsted free, to take protection away from that trust. It has enjoyed, I want to say to the gentlemen on this side, for years preferences in the tariff. It enjoyed them by reason of a slight shrinkage in certain wools from the Argentine. It enjoys them by reason of a differential between unwashed wool on the skin in classes Nos. 1 and 2. From 1898 to the time of the passage of the Payne bill the worsted industry enjoyed a preference by reason of a high duty on tops and on yarns. Partly by the aid of its financial transactions and partly by the aid of the tariff this great Worsted Trust has grown up.

Now, I want to say to the gentlemen on that side, pledged, as they are pledged, to a higher authority than their party caucus, namely, to their national convention utterance, the pledge in a national convention, they can not afford to vote against the proposition to make either tops, worsted yarns, or cloth for men or women free. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HILL. I read while at home this past week the speech of the gentleman from Kansas on the American Woolen Co., and with much of it I agree. If he will stop and take into consideration what he proposes now, to make worsted free, where would the carded industries come out on that proposition? Is he willing to make wool free, too?

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman ask me that question?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly. I am willing to say this to the gentleman from Connecticut. Not very long ago I voted with the gentleman, after a very eloquent pleading of his, to make some products of Kansas free. Why does not the gentleman from Connecticut vote with me to make some of his manufactured products free?

Mr. HILL. Oh, the gentleman's proposition is——

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Connecticut is ready to vote on any proposition respecting the tariff, and he takes no bluff from any gentleman from Kansas or any other Western State with respect to any New England manufacturing industry. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman vote for my amendment to remove the duty on tops?

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman wishes to vote for English free trade, I will give the gentleman an opportunity out of my time to take that question up and discuss it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask merely that the gentleman vote for free tops, and——

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Kansas declined to allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. Here are two articles that sell side by side on the counter in competition with each other, a worsted suit of clothes and a woolen suit of clothes. The gentleman proposes to put a tax of 40 per cent on one, while making the other free. Where is the woolen industry of the United States coming out on that proposition? Why, Mr. Chairman, it simply illustrates the old couplet:

> A little learning is a dangerous thing;
> Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.

[Applause and laughter.]

The gentleman wants to carry out his ideas and let the rest of the country go to wherever it pleases. [Laughter.]

Now, that is all I have got to say about the matter, Mr. Chairman. I simply present the proposition that you take two competing articles, placed side by side, making one free and putting a high tax on the other, and you destroy the taxed industry, for it is just as easy to protect a thing by putting it on the free list as by putting a high duty on it. The gentleman has not discovered that feature of tariff legislation in view of the remarks which he offers on this propositon.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman, then, when he votes against my amendment here, vote it down because of his solicitude for the carded-woolen manufacturer?

Mr. HILL. Oh, no; not at all. I want to be fair to everybody. I want to be fair to the woolgrower in the Rocky Mountains, and I want to be fair to the woolen manufacturer in Pennsylvania as well as the woolen manufacturer in New England. I want to be fair to everybody. But it is not fair to take two competing articles and protect one by free trade and put a high tax upon the other. That is all there is about it. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask whether the gentleman is acquainted with the testimony that was given——

Mr. HILL. Oh, I am not afraid of anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I know that the gentleman is not afraid of anything. I am aware of the gentleman's courage. [Laughter.] But is the gentleman aware of the testimony taken in 1909, when the gentleman was present as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and asked questions about woolens? Does the gentleman remember the answer he got to one question, I think from Mr. Moir, to the effect that the worsted interest regarded the woolen interest as virtually out of it in the United States as a competitor?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I think there was injustice and unfairness in the apportionment of the duties in that bill as between the woolen industry and the carded-wool industry. But I do not think it would regulate or remedy that unfairness by making it still more unfair.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman if he believes in protecting trust-controlled products?

Mr. HILL. O Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in destroying an industry of $500,000,000 annually simply for the sake of getting a crack at any institution. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman to-day, after the decision of the Supreme Court, would vote for a duty on petroleum, crude and refined.

Mr. HILL. No; the gentleman is mistaken. I voted against it, because I did not think it made a particle of difference whether it had a duty or not. We were exporting $150,000,000 worth of it a year, and the duty could not affect the price of it any more than a duty could affect the price of wheat. I do not believe in duties laid either for revenge or favoritism. One is just as bad as the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to detain the House at this time. With much that the gentleman from Kansas has said I am in hearty accord, but his ground of complaint against the committee is not well founded, because the existing duty upon combed wool and tops works out an ad valorem equivalent of 111 per cent, and the committee has offered you a bill reducing that duty to 20 per cent. That seems to me a sufficient answer to the argument of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the Ways and Means Committee and the Democratic caucus had put tops upon the free list, would not the gentleman from New York have supported the proposition?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Of course, I would have supported the proposition; but I support this proposition because it is the one that the committee did adopt, and that the caucus advocated.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is better, is not, to go still further and do what is the plain duty of this body to do, which is to make these tops free? Tops go wholly into the manufacture of worsted. Tops do not enter into woolens at all.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman from Kansas is no doubt aware that if my personal preferences had prevailed, this would be free, but I am satisfied that the committee in its wisdom has come to the proper conclusion, and the caucus having adopted the bill, I am willing to vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the pending bill will greatly benefit the carpet and other textile industries and also the hundreds of thousands of skilled operatives employed in those lines, as well as the consumers of woolen goods.

On Wednesday last one of my colleagues from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made a long speech against the revision of the wool schedule. His remarks were taken very seriously by one Philadelphia newspaper, which stated in large headlines that all on this side of the House who had the temerity to question his statements—from the leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, down to my humble self—were swept aside or promptly squelched by the cyclonic force of Mr. MOORE'S eloquence. Of course, my distinguished colleague would not be a party to any such exaggeration, for I believe he is entirely fair and wants to be correctly reported.

That gentleman did, however, make some broad statements regarding certain mills in Philadelphia having discontinued business as a result of the tariff agitation. As a matter of fact, I am informed that most of the concerns which he mentioned have been in a bad way for a long time; and we know that mills have failed in Philadelphia and elsewhere during periods of greatest industrial prosperity.

As to the "soup houses" in Philadelphia, to which my colleague referred in his speech, I find that there has been no increase in their number during the past two years; that in the northeastern section, to which he particularly alluded, the same number exists as did immediately after the passage of the unfortunate Schedule K, which now finds few earnest defenders even among the standpatters.

President Taft, in his speech at Beverly, Mass., said:

> The woolen schedule is indefensible, and I propose to say so.

And the same high Republican authority has repeated that statement, in substance, in his more recent speeches.

The carded-woolen manufacturers as far back as March, 1909, issued this significant manifesto regarding the high duty upon wool:

> The carded-woolen manufacturers have appealed to the Ways and Means Committee for fair play in vain. If the House of Representatives denies it to them, they will appeal to the Senate. If justice is refused there, they will appeal to the President of the United States. If he fails to give us justice, then we will carry our case to the court that makes and unmakes Presidents, Senates, and Houses of Representatives—the American people—confident that they will sooner or later strip from the tariff law the special privileges that are now giving the worsted spinners such great advantages at the expense of the woolgrowers, the carded-woolen manufacturers, and the consumers of this country.

I have no doubt that my presence here to-day as a Representative of a great textile district is part of the response of the American people to the appeal of those who have prayed to be relieved of this unjust burden. [Applause.]

Mr. Robert Dornan, of Philadelphia, one of the leading representatives of the carpet industry in America, wrote me under date of May 9, 1911, as follows:

> DEAR MR. DONOHOE: The within brief, as you will notice by the names appended, represents the views of the carpet manufacturers of the country. The committee whose names appear have been selected to represent the industry, and the brief embodies their ideas, and, as you will note, as no third class (carpet wools) are raised in the United States there is no necessity for a protective duty on such wools.

It is their belief, however, that an ad valorem duty for revenue would be a proper one, and I hope your views may concur with those expressed in the brief.

Very truly, yours, ROBERT DORNAN.

I will place in the RECORD the brief to which Mr. Dornan refers, and also some other excerpts.

When the President of the United States has declared Schedule K to be indefensible, when the carded-woolen manufacturers of the country have condemned it as fostering monopoly, and when the spokesmen of other great textile branches, in which wool forms an essential part of their raw material, have declared in favor of the pending bill, I, as the Representative of the fifth Pennsylvania district, the greatest textile center in the country, have no hesitation in supporting the measure. Its passage will mean cheaper and better raw materials and hence higher quality in our manufactured goods; and these will assuredly make for increased demand for our textile products and increased employment for our people. [Applause.]

The late Senator Dolliver in a debate in the Senate had this to say regarding Schedule K:

I think the duties on all the by-products of worsted making are too high. They are prohibitory. They are unequal. The range of the prices of the articles is so great that when you set a specific duty on one you are already necessarily creating inequalities. When you put the rate high enough for the highest, you make it ridiculously high for the low and the ordinary.

And again:

GROUND TO POVERTY BY TARIFF LAWS.

I want now to approach one of the complaints that these great American manufacturers have made to me, and I confess it has not only convinced my judgment, but it has touched my heart. I am not so cold-blooded as some. When a man comes to me and says, "For 50 years my father and I have been building up a great woolen manufacturing industry, and I find myself ground to poverty and bankruptcy by the laws of the United States," I am not so constituted that I can tell him not to occupy my time; that if the business is not profitable to quit it; that the thing is obsolete; that their inheritance from their fathers is in a way to be totally destroyed; lock it up and quit and get into some other business. I am not so constituted. I would not do that until I had spent a good many days trying to find out what the man's real grievance was, and I think I have gotten down to this simple point.

In a letter to the Woolgrowers' Association, Mr. Edward Moir, president of the Carded Woolen Manufacturers' Association, under date of December 24, 1910, said:

I desire to urge upon you the vital importance of a prompt and thorough revision of Schedule K on the basis of justice. It is not alone the woolgrowers and wool manufacturers who are the parties in interest. The consumers are asserting their right to be heard, and no tariff can remain long on the statute book that does not have the approval of the consumers. We have good reason to congratulate ourselves on the fact that an overwhelming majority of the American people believe in and are ready to maintain the policy of protection to American industry. But the people want this protection to be fair. They want privilege and discrimination to be eliminated. It is for us, producers of wool and wool goods, to cooperate with the public in accomplishing that result. The woolgrowers, carded-woolen manufacturers, worsted manufacturers, and clothiers should resolve henceforth to defend no schedule that is not fair to all. They should repudiate once and for all the policy by which for 44 years schedules have been defended by alliances of special interest. They should cooperate, but that cooperation should have only one object—to make the tariff on wool and wool goods fair to all—and thus insure the permanence of the protective tariff by retaining the confidence of the people.

INJURY TO BUSINESS NOT CAUSED BY THOSE WHO ARE TRYING TO MAKE SCHEDULE K FAIR.

The plea for a cessation of tariff agitation because of the disturbance of business is entitled to no consideration. The injury to business is not caused by those who are trying to make Schedule K fair, but by those who, profiting by special privileges under that schedule, have successfully resisted every effort to eliminate its inequalities.

And to the worsted weavers and knitters, Mr. Moir has stated:

Schedule K was framed by the worsted spinners and for the worsted spinners. It promises the woolgrower a protection of 33 cents a scoured pound, and then allows the worsted spinner to import worsted wool at 16 cents or less a scoured pound, while excluding the wool and by-products for carded-woolen goods by prohibitory duties. It gives the worsted spinner a secure monopoly by means of prohibitory duties on yarn, and on the by-products he has for sale, and provides that any foreign competition in manufactured materials shall fall on the mills that buy yarn to be woven or knit into goods. The worsted spinner profits going and coming under this schedule, which in its way is the most remarkable document the human mind has ever produced.

HOW LONG WILL THE WEAVERS AND KNITTERS CONSENT TO REMAIN THE WORSTED SPINNERS' GOAT?

All this is plain, but the feature of the situation that is unexplained and, possibly, unexplainable, is why the worsted weavers continue to lick the hands of those who smite them. How long will the worsted weavers and knitters be content to have their business existence depend on such difference between the domestic and foreign price of yarn as the spinners may allow? How long will the weavers and the knitters consent to remain the worsted spinners' goats? Will the weavers and knitters take advantage of the present opportunity and insist that their industry shall be placed under conditions of fair competition by the approaching revision of the Payne tariff?

On May 1, 1911, the following brief was submitted by the carpet manufacturers' committee to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives:

On behalf of most of the carpet manufacturers in the country, we beg to submit a few observations on the subject of third-class wools, commonly known as carpet wools.

Certain facts with regard to these wools stand admitted by all men with any knowledge of the subject, and are as follows:

No third-class wool is raised in the United States, and none has been raised here for many years.

That as no carpet wools are raised in the United States, the duty thereon should be considered for revenue.

That all carpet wools brought into the United States are used for making carpets and rugs, except a very small percentage, not to exceed 2 to 3 per cent, used for making horse blankets and felt boots. That a very trifling quantity, if any, is used in making clothing.

That wools of the third class, as defined by all our tariff laws since 1867, are becoming scarcer every year as the semicivilized peoples who raise the native sheep (from which carpet wools must come) learn to cross them with Merino or English blood. This they are gradually doing all over the world, and this at once takes the wool out of the third class and puts it in either first or second class.

That because of this growing scarcity the price of these wools is steadily increasing, and the cost of such wools coming into the United States at the present high duty is growing greater each year.

That the scarcity referred to has been intensified because certain carpet wools were taken out of class 3 and put into class 1 when the Dingley law was enacted. These wools had always been classed as carpet wools and were used for no other purpose, and since the reclassification referred to, have not come into this country, with the result that the Government has been deprived of the revenue, and the carpet manufacturer has been deprived of the wools. They have sold in the foreign market since the reclassification at lower prices than they brought when they were admitted to the United States as carpet wools, showing conclusively that their only value abroad was as carpet wools.

That the duty on these wools, being in effect only a revenue duty (there being no industry of the kind in this country to protect), the duty is included in the cost of the manufactured goods and becomes a part of the price to the consumer. Any reduction of the duty on these wools would immediately result in lower prices on carpets and rugs.

The carpet business, which has invested in it more than $75,000,000 and employs more than 40,000 operatives in normal times (mostly skilled), is still conducted in the old-fashioned way, and each manufacturer is independent of the other. There is not now, nor has there ever been, a combination or trust in the industry.

It is not our purpose to haunt the Halls of Congress or importune the various members of the committee on this subject. We refer you to the arguments made before the Payne committee, which are as sound to-day as they were then, and which show, as we believe, that we are entitled to the relief we ask.

COMPENSATORY DUTIES.

We do not ask for lower duties on raw materials and high duties on our manufactured products, for we expect the compensating duty on our manufactured goods to be reduced in the same proportion as the duties are reduced on our raw materials.

We presented to the Payne committee reliable and accurate figures, showing how carpet wools are consumed, and that only a nominal percentage of the total imports can possibly be used outside of carpet and rug factories. These figures were secured at the request of the committee and have never been disputed.

SCHEDULE K PLACES PREMIUM ON FRAUD.

The present duty on third-class wools being specific, with a dividing line in value, places a premium upon fraud and dishonesty, and we believe this has been the experience of our Government under the Dingley law. We are informed that a greater number of entries of third-class wool have been advanced and penalized than in first and second classes combined. How can it be otherwise, when we know that dishonest importers, by undervaluing only a fraction of a penny per pound, escape an advance of 3 cents per pound in the duty? A saving of 3 cents per pound is about 25 per cent on the cost of the wool.

If we had ad valorem duties, no importer, however dishonest, would take the chance of a penalty by understating the cost of his wool, for the difference in the duty would be very slight. If his wool now costs him 12 cents per pound he pays 4 cents per pound duty, but if it cost him 12½ cents per pound he pays a duty of 7 cents. On 1,000,000 pounds (which is but an ordinary purchase) this difference in duty would amount to $30,000, quite a sufficient inducement for a dishonest man to attempt to defraud the Government; whereas if the wool cost him 12½ cents per pound and he paid an ad valorem duty, the difference in the amount of duty would be too small to be a temptation to undervalue.

MORE REVENUE.

Statistics show that the Government collects more revenue under an ad valorem duty on wools than it does under specific rates, and there is less undervaluing.

So it may be said of all classes of wool that a specific duty per pound of wool in whatever condition it is imported is as unscientific as it is unjust, and the only duty equally fair to the Government and the manufacturer is an ad valorem duty, for the condition and quality of the wool determine its value, and the ad valorem duty follows the value either up or down.

Where is the justice of assessing the same duty per pound on wool yielding only 40 pounds of clean wool out of 100 pounds in the grease as on wool yielding 75 pounds of clean wool out of 100 pounds of wool in the grease, thus practically doubling the duty per pound to the manufacturer who brings in wool yielding only 40 pounds?

AMERICAN CARPET MANUFACTURERS HANDICAPPED.

England, France, and Germany admit all wools free, and with such a duty as now exists on carpet wools it is plain to see under what a handicap the American carpet manufacturer labors when he competes in the markets of the world for his raw material. The dividing line in cost under our tariff places him absolutely at the mercy of his foreign competitor on third-class wools, and he is obliged to stand back until the wants of the foreign manufacturers have been supplied. Our manufacturers can bid against them up to 12 cents, but there they must stop or have an additional duty of 3 cents per pound charged against the purchase. An ad valorem duty would remove this restraint on business and result in increased imports of the better grades of carpet wools, thus insuring increased revenue to the Government.

NO INJURY TO ANY INDUSTRY AND CHEAPER CARPETS TO THE PUBLIC.

A purely revenue duty could be placed upon wools of the third class, including the wools taken from this class in 1897, and which should now be restored, without doing the least injury to any industry in the United States, and would result in cheaper carpets to the public.

If it is thought best to fix a lower ad valorem rate on wools of the third class than on wools of the first and second classes, we respectfully ask that the wools of the third class, which under the Dingley law of 1897 were transferred to class 1, be restored to class 3. These wools are Bagdad, China lamb's, Castel Branco, and Adrianople, or butcher's wool.

We should be glad to furnish your committee with any information in our possession; to appear and answer any question propounded to us, and prepare, if desired, a schedule showing reductions on manufactured goods to correspond with any reductions made on raw wool.

Respectfully submitted by the carpet manufacturers' committee.

Treasurer Bigelow Carpet Co., Boston, Mass.

Vice President W. & J. Sloane, New York City.

POLITICAL PARTISANS AND SPECIAL INTERESTS.

The foregoing plain statements are sufficient to convince me that the wool schedule of the Payne bill is inequitable and unjust and that it should be revised downward with the least possible delay. I am willing to accept the sober judgment of men who have practical knowledge of the subject rather than the opinions of men who are practical only as politicians and whose special training has been in the direction of special interests.

When gentlemen talk about their great concern for our manufacturers and yet vote in favor of monopolies that are crushing them to the wall, and when they make noisy and incessant proclamation of their love for the toiling masses and yet vote against such measures as Canadian reciprocity, that would bring them relief in steadier employment and cheaper necessities of life, I am forced to inquire: Do these gentlemen believe that most of the people can be fooled most of the time, or do they not know that an intelligent electorate can, and sometimes does, choose its own Representatives? [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing, the time of Mr. DONOHOE having expired,

Mr. DONOHOE. I ask two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I desire to say that apparently the afternoon will be occupied properly in discussing amendments to the bill itself, and not engaging in general discussion, which all gentlemen had plenty of time to get into in the 15 days' general debate. While I shall not object to this, if there are many more speeches of this kind, I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be extended two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOHOE resumed and completed his remarks, as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read:

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

3. On combed wool or tops and roving or roping, made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair, and on other wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 12, by striking out the words "in this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2 by striking out the words "30 per cent ad valorem," in line 15, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "25 cents per pound and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, if my first amendment had prevailed, I should have offered an amendment that would have harmonized paragraph 2 of the bill with the basis of a duty upon scoured wool instead of wool in the grease.

I have offered this amendment to paragraph 3, the effect of which is to strike out the words "washed or" in the paragraph, and to place the duty on the wool upon the basis of scoured wool, to remove the ad valorem basis, making it specific, and give to the manufacturer a protection equivalent to that given to the grower, proposed by me in my first amendment, and then a protection as against the manufacturers of foreign countries upon an ad valorem basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

4. On yarns made wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "ad valorem," in line 15, page 2, the following: "Provided, That all worsted yarns be admitted free of duty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, by striking out the words "30 per cent ad valorem," in line 15, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "25 cents per pound and in addition thereto 25 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This is the last amendment I propose to offer, and I have offered it for the purpose of indicating the amendments I would offer if it seemed worth while to offer any further amendments to the succeeding paragraphs. I want to reiterate that my plan is a duty on a specific basis upon the imports of wool measured upon wool in the grease, and then a duty to protect the manufacturer as against the competition of foreign countries upon the ad valorem basis.

And now a word with regard to how I propose to vote. I have already outlined my position on Schedule K. I have pointed out wherein it should be amended. I have called attention to the errors of the pending bill as I see them. The majority of this House appears determined to pass this bill without amendment and without waiting the report of the Tariff Board, and should the idea not prevail of holding this bill upon the House side until we may have the report of that board, I propose to support the motion to send this measure to the Senate. Many Republicans feel that a vote for this bill will be misunderstood. I say not. Rather a vote against it will be misunderstood. Such a vote will be regarded as an approval of Schedule K. Are you in favor of it, or are you opposed to it? Are you afraid to intrust the wool schedule to consideration in the Senate? Under the Constitution all revenue bills must originate in the House. They can not originate in the Senate. What bills are before the Senate that could possibly be used as a basis for modification of tariff schedules? The Senate will not use the reciprocity bill for such a basis. That is not thinkable. The free-list bill is not a revenue bill, and it was so held in this body. Regardless, then, of errors in the pending bill, I say that Republicans who believe that the woolen schedule should be amended should vote to send this bill to the Senate. Under the circumstances, I believe that such a vote is the only vote that is consistent with a belief that this schedule should be amended at the earliest possible date, and I believe that before many months the Senate and the House will be able to unite on a measure that will bring the desired relief to the consumers, and at the same time place the great businesses that have been entered upon of manufacturing woolens and of husbanding the flocks and producing wool upon a stable basis, because they will be upon a basis that will commend itself to the sense of equality and fair play of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. On cloths, knit fabrics, felts not woven, and all manufactures of every description made, by any process, wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Amend, page 2, line 18, by striking out the words "in this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I called the attention of the committe a while ago to the fact that this was an independent bill and will be an independent act if made into law. It is not a part of the present tariff law. This provision in the bill provides that all manufactures, of every description, made by any process, of wool or any part of wool not especially provided for in this act shall pay a duty of 40 per cent.

It repeals every provision in the existing law in conflict with it. It will put upon the dutiable list scientific, religious, and educational apparatus and instruments if they are composed in any part of wool. It will put on the dutiable list tools of trade composed in any part of wool. All of these not now mentioned being now on the free list.

It will put on the dutiable list society and religious regalia if composed in any part of wool. It will put on the dutiable list collections in illustration of the progress of art, science, and manufacture if composed in any part of wool, as many of them are. It will increase the duty on roofing felt from 10 per cent, as provided by law, to 40 per cent, as provided in this bill. It will increase the duties on manufactures of rubber having some wool in them from 35 per cent to 40 per cent, and in some cases much more. It will put on the dutiable list of 40 per cent rubber scrap, that now comes in free, if it has any wool in connection with it.

If the gentleman will accept the amendment which I propose, striking out the term "in this act," it leaves all of these provisions in the law and provides that articles not otherwise specially provided for shall pay the duty or come in free, as now provided for. But when they say "not specially provided for in this act," and there being no provision in this act in reference to these things—and this being an independent act, putting all of these things under this provision in this act which are composed in part of wool—if that is the intention of the gentleman, very well; but if it is the intention of the gentleman to leave these articles now coming in free upon the free list, then they should strike out the language "in this act."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to detain the committee only a moment. The gentleman from Illinois is a very able parliamentary leader. He is well versed in the specialties that he has studied in this House, but I think that he has clearly demonstrated that he has never served on the tariff committee of this House in the amendments and arguments that he has offered to-day. The gentleman makes the argument before this House that because we take this law out of the Payne tariff law and enact a separate law that anything that has wool in it that we do not enumerate as being on the free list is put on the dutiable list. Now, the absurdity of that is answered in one question. I ask the gentleman what the duty would be? What would the duty be on these articles?

Mr. MANN. That is easily answered—40 per cent. That is what the bill provides.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. There is nothing in these articles that he refers to that would connect them with this "cloth and knit fabrics and felt not woven, and all manufactures of every description."

Mr. MANN. "And all manufactures of every description made, by any process, wholly or in part of wool." That means everything.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The courts have held, and the decisions are uniform, that you can not take a matter from the free list and put it on the dutiable list or from the dutiable list and put it on the free list by implication. You have got to enact specifically or the court will construe that you did not intend to amend the original law.

Mr. MANN. That is what this is. Mr. Chairman, the existing law in all of these provisions says "Not specially provided for in this section," and if this were in the existing law, and that language read that way, with the rest of the language precisely as it is, then when the article comes in which is made partly of wool and cotton, for instance, the question is, Which is the most definite description of the article, this provision "All manufactures, composed wholly or in part of wool," or a provision in the cotton schedule providing that goods shall pay a duty under the cotton schedule when the chief value is cotton?

The courts have held, construing these two provisions apparently contradictory in the same law, where they must presume that there was not intent to have contradiction, that in reference to cotton or other articles where there is the provision respecting an article composed in chief value of cotton, that that shall pay the cotton-schedule duty, although there is another provision, providing that an article composed in part of wool shall pay the woolen schedule. If it had been inserted as an amendment to the Payne law, that would still exist, but here is an independent act which does not refer to the Payne law at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the language of this act has been submitted to the Treasury Department and conforms to their views. The decisions are here, and my colleague will read them.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the decisions have no application. The decisions are based upon a law containing both provisions in the same law. Here we pass a subsequent act. I am familiar with the letter from the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department suggests certain changes in the form of this bill, supposing that it was to be inserted as an amendment to the Payne law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Well, I talked with the Treasury Department, and I have a copy of the letter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The bill was submitted to them in this form, except the changes that we adopted.

Mr. MANN. I have a copy of the letter which the Treasury Department submitted to the gentleman, and talked with the Treasury officials about it, and the Treasury officials said there could be no possible escape from the conclusion that I reached, that this, being a later, independent act, controls, and that it was not controlled by a provision in the existing law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would not differ with the gentleman from Illinois in his statement of a fact, but I would not at the same time bring the indictment that he does against the Treasury Department of the United States—that they submitted to the Ways and Means Committee of this House a letter advising them as to the technicalities of a bill that was to be presented to pass, and then changed their minds about it and did not advise the Ways and Means Committee to that effect. The gentleman must have misunderstood the Treasury officials, because the indictment he brings against them is entirely too serious.

Mr. MANN. The letter I suppose the gentleman has is from the Secretary of the Treasury. I did not converse with the Secretary of the Treasury, nor did the gentleman from Alabama adopt the suggestion made by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter as to the amendment in this regard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes, I did.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman did not. If he will examine the letter he will see that the Treasury Department suggested that the bill be amended not along the lines that I have suggested, but in another respect, and the gentleman did not adopt that suggestion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did, absolutely.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will get the letter and publish it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the contention which the gentleman from Illinois has just made has been brought already before our courts, and there is a specific rule laid down in the decisions which cover this point. The court, in the case of Hartranft v. The United States (135 U. S., 237), which is a decision made in 1890, and followed by the decision of United States v. Scruggs (156 Fed. Rep., 940), which was a decision rendered in 1907, both laid down the doctrine that the provision for manufactures of chief value is more specific than the provision for manufactures in part of value of wool or any other component part, and that if it was desired to extend the scope of the woolen paragraph to all manufactures of which wool is a component a general provision to that effect should be inserted in the wool schedule. In the case which laid down the same rule, of Slazenger v. United States (91 Fed. Rep., 517), it was held that tennis balls made partly of wool and partly of rubber were subject to the duty on rubber, as that was the component part of chief value, and this rule so laid down and supported will be the rule applied in importations under this present bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Were not those decisions all rendered under the act which contained both those provisions in it?

Mr. PETERS. I believe they were; but I do not think that makes any difference.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it makes no difference, or rather does the gentleman think there is any method by which we can say in this act the articles composed in part of wool should pay the wool schedule? Is there any language by which we could do that?

Mr. PETERS. I presume such language could be used, but it is not used in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Could the gentleman find any language or suggest any language that would be more complete than this language:

All manufactures of every description made by any process wholly or in part of wool.

Can the gentleman suggest any language more complete than that language if he wanted to put a provision in this bill that all articles manufactured or composed in part of wool should pay the woolen schedule?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor and I yielded for a question to the gentleman from Illinois, and I am trying to answer it. I still have the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PETERS. I wish first to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois. I think that the language is the same as that used in the present law and would be subject to the same construction, but if it is the desire to make this provision——

Mr. MANN. The language is not the same that is in the present law. The gentleman is mistaken. The present law provides that articles not specially provided for in this section, which is this section of the Payne law. This provides, in this act——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more. I have consumed part of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Massachusetts have his time extended for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The decisions the gentleman referred to relate to clauses in the Dingley bill, the decision of 1890 related to the McKinley bill, but the conflicting provisions were all contained in the same act, were they not?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, here is a different case I want to point out to the gentleman. This repeals all provisions in regard to wool in the present law by the repealing clause in the bill. This section refers to the present act. It is a subsequent act to the present law and contains this expressed language, and I do not think the gentleman has answered the objection at all.

On cloths, knit fabrics, felts not woven, and all manufactures of every description made, by any process, wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

Now, that repeals all the clauses so far as they conflict with this act.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman is making a speech and not asking me a question.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see any escape from it. I do not think the gentleman or the decisions in any way answer the plain interpretation of that language in this bill. It is a mistake, and the gentleman might just as well acknowledge it now as to acknowledge it afterwards.

Mr. PETERS. It is difficult for me to derive a question from the gentleman's speech to answer, but, so far as I can get a question, I will say that this bill that we have before us takes the place of the other section—the present Schedule K of the Payne Act—and would be subject to the same construction, and I do not think the objections which the other side are making on this point are valid.

Mr. PAYNE. Let me refer the gentleman again to the language of the repealing section:

That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act—

The duties on any part of wool that conflict with it—

are hereby repealed.

Now, it repeals everything that is in conflict with this act.

Mr. PETERS. The only thing it repeals is Schedule K of the present Payne law.

Mr. PAYNE. It repeals everything in conflict with the provisions of this act, and the section referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], on page 2, is in conflict with all the provisions of the present law in regard to a duty on wool, where only a part of an article, and a small part of it, is made of wool. There is no escape from it. I do not care what the Secretary of the Treasury has said where his attention was called to the specific language in this act, and I do not care what the Secretary of the Treasury may finally conclude, as it goes to the court.

Mr. PETERS. Is the gentleman still asking me a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] has expired.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I can just repeat that this section comes in plainly as taking the place of Schedule K of the present law.

Mr. MANN. It would have come in that way if you had adopted the first amendment I offered.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to talk on the amendment, but I would like five minutes under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that I am naturally opposed to this bill because it reduces the duty to a point, in my opinion, that will be absolutely destructive, not only to the wool producing, but the woolen manufacturing industry of this country. I have before me statistics and figures that show that the rates of duties fixed in the Wilson law reduced the duty on manufactured woolens to 50 per cent ad valorem, provided that the price did not exceed a certain sum, and 55 per cent on values above that amount, and placed wool on the free list, which drove to the wall a great number of woolen manufacturing institutions in this country. They either went into bankruptcy and discontinued business, or went into the hands of a receiver, or were absorbed by some other concern. This proposed law goes further than that, for it would reduce the duty on woolens to 40 per cent ad valorem, an average of 40 per cent, and, in addition, leave a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on wool. That places the manufacturer at a much greater disadvantage than the Wilson bill, which destroyed a great number of institutions, a list of which I will give.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, past history and sad experience of people engaged in this industry shows us that if this bill is enacted into law it will prove of greater destruction to the woolen industry than did the Wilson tariff law that destroyed so many of those institutions.

As to the price of foreign wools, I may say, first, the average foreign wools that are imported are not the heavy shrinking wools, but the lightest shrinking wools found in foreign markets, for the reason that heavy shrinking wools, paying the rate of duty on wool of the first class of 11 cents per pound, can not be imported into our market and sold in competition with the light shrinking wools of Europe. Therefore, I say it is only the light shrinking foreign wools that come into our markets, and the price of such wool to-day in our markets is about 22½ cents to 24 cents a pound.

Now, a reduction of the duty from 11 cents a pound to 20 per cent ad valorem means a reduction on wool now coming into our market at the present market price of about 60 per cent of the present rate of duty. Now, a producer of wool on the farm or a manufacturer of wool can not stand that reduction, gentlemen, and succeed. There is no question in my mind about that.

We have to-day, in round numbers, about 50,000,000 sheep—wool sheep—in this country. The great demand for mutton for food supply brings about the destruction, by slaughter for food supply, of nearly 25,000,000 head of sheep annually in the United States. The great increase in the number of sheep since the repeal of the Wilson tariff law has been due to the great value of sheep for our meat supply and not altogether to their value for wool, because on the best grade of sheep in the land about 8 pounds of wool to the sheep is the average high-grade fleece; and when wool is selling for 15 or 18 or 20 cents a pound it can be readily seen that in the average State in this country sheep can not be raised for the wool alone, but are raised not only for the wool but also for their value for mutton. Therefore, gentlemen, a reduction of the duty to the point that will not make it profitable for the farmer to raise sheep for wool will destroy our flocks of sheep and reduce the number as it did in 1894 and 1895 and 1896 and make it unprofitable to raise sheep in this country—a very valuable asset to the American people.

But much has been said of late through the magazines and press of the country about woolens being so high that woolen goods in the homes of people of ordinary and humble circumstances were as scarce as diamonds. Let me call your attention to this fact, gentlemen, that the entire woolen product of the United States is about $500,000,000 annually, and the people of the United States last year spent for strong drink alone more than three times that sum, or $1,600,000,000.

If the people of the United States would economize on strong drink, by using the money spent for that luxury, or, rather, that article, which is not a necessary of life, we could all walk covered with the best of woolen clothing.

Mr. Chairman, all must admit that we are an extravagant people and squander large sums of money for many articles that bring little or no comforts to our families, where, on the other hand, if the husband and the housewife would economize in such expenditures, the real necessaries of life could be obtained to a far greater degree than at present.

This assault upon Schedule K gives special timeliness to the report upon the woolen and worsted industry of the United States which was recently published by Director Durand of the Federal Census. This new statement is for the calendar year ending December 31, 1909, the year of the enactment of the Aldrich-Payne tariff and a period of high prosperity in the American woolen and worsted trade. An enumeration for the present year would undoubtedly tell a very different story.

But in 1909 American mills were very fully employed, and a great deal of new and productive machinery was coming into operation, particularly in Massachusetts and other New England States. It should be understood that the present statement covers only woolen and worsted goods, and does not include carpets, felt goods, hosiery, knit goods, and so forth. This makes all the more significant the announcement of the Census Bureau that the total capital invested in the making of woolen and worsted goods had increased from $256,554,000 in 1899 to $302,767,000 in 1904 and to $415,465,000 in 1909, a proportionate gain in the decade of 62 per cent. The total value of the products had increased from $238,745,000 in 1899 to $307,942,000 in 1904 and to $419,828,000 in 1909, a gain in the decade of 76 per cent. The growth of the industry in the 5 years, from 1904 to 1909, as a matter of fact, was greater than in any 10 years before. In no other country, save perhaps in Germany, has the wool manufacture flourished and expanded of late years as it has in the United States.

The cost of the materials used in this great American industry was $148,087,000 in 1899, $197,480,000 in 1904, and $273,466,000 in 1909, a gain for 10 years of no less than 85 per cent. One reason for this increase is apparently the fact which this impartial Federal investigation discloses, that American mills engaged in the manufacture of fabrics for American clothing are consuming more and more of pure wool and relatively less of substitutes. The census statement specifically shows that the amount of raw wool, foreign and domestic, used in American mills increased from 330,179,000 pounds in 1899 to 474,751,000 pounds in 1909, a gain of 44 per cent; or, a still fairer basis of comparison, that the wool used, in a scoured condition, was equivalent to 192,706,000 pounds in 1899 and to 289,703,000 pounds in 1909, a gain of 50 per cent. In the same period, according to these authoritative Federal returns, the use of shoddy fell off from 33,037,000 pounds in 1899 to 21,554,000 pounds in 1909, a decrease of 35 per cent.

Raw cotton used in the same period fell off from 40,245,000 pounds to 20,055,000 pounds—a decrease of 50 per cent; and although cotton yarns increased from 35,343,000 pounds to 39,169,000 pounds, a gain of 11 per cent, the Federal report notes that—

> The net result is a decided decrease in the amount of cotton used as a material by wool manufacturers.

The report states further that the lessened use of shoddy—> is explained by the fact that the manufacture of worsted fabrics into which shoddy does not enter as a material to any appreciable extent has increased enormously, while the quantity of woolen fabrics in which shoddy is utilized was actually less in 1909 than in 1899.

These hard official facts and figures are rather sharp and damaging comment on the assertions of certain overzealous writers in recent magazines that shoddy and cotton pervaded all American cloths and that real wool was swiftly vanishing. Now that a revision of Schedule K has become inevitable, the Government itself appears to be proving that the political attack upon it has been seriously overdone.

In the manufacture of shoddy it will be remembered that rags are used to a very great extent. Rags are graded into three grades, the third being the poorest grade. Such rags are taken from rags gathered that have rendered long service, and the wool in which has long since lost its durability. When washed, such rags are picked into yarn once more, and then, by a system of machines, picked back into the wool fiber and again spun into woolen yarns, the strength of which will not stand the throw of the shuttle in the looms, and in order to give such yarns the necessary strength to stand the weaving without breaking, a machine has been invented by some genius which wraps a little thread of cotton around this rotten yarn, which gives it strength. Then the yarn is converted into shoddy cloth and placed upon our markets as all-wool goods—an imposition upon the people, an article sold to them represented to be good woolen clothing, which really, by law, should be prohibited from being converted into cloth.

This bill, instead of placing a duty of 10 cents per pound on imported rags, reduces the duty to 20 per cent ad valorem. An examination of the records of the Treasury Department or the Bureau of Statistics would reveal the fact that under the Wilson-Gorman tariff law, when such rags were on the free list, their importation greatly increased. The Dingley law placed a duty of 10 cents per pound on rags, and since the adoption of that law in 1897 the importation of rags has greatly fallen off, a very meritorious act indeed, and the Payne tariff law—a tariff law now in force upon our statute books—carries the same rate of duty on rags that was carried in the Dingley law. I warn the people of the country to beware of the purchase of worthless shoddy put upon our markets, and I warn Congress that the reduction of the duty on rags as proposed in this bill will greatly increase this imposition on our people.

The Gorman-Wilson tariff law in its woolen schedule took effect on January 1, 1895, and remained in force until superseded by the Dingley tariff law on July 24, 1897.

In March, 1893, the Boston price of Montana medium wool was 52 to 53 cents a scoured pound, and in March, 1894, anticipating by a few months the free wool of the Gorman-Wilson law, the price of this same wool was 30 to 32 cents a scoured pound, a loss of 40 per cent.

The report for January, 1895, of the statistician of the Department of Agriculture showed that American sheep had shrunk in numbers from 47,274,000 in 1893 to 42,294,064, or practically the figure of 1880.

In 1880 fine Ohio washed-fleece clothing wool was selling at 50 cents a pound, medium at 55 cents, and coarse at 48 cents. In January, 1894, under the threat of imminent free wool the same wool was selling at 23 cents, 24 cents, and 21 cents.

From the taking effect of the Gorman-Wilson woolen duties on January 1, 1895, foreign woolen manufactures poured into this country at an average rate of $5,000,000 per month, reaching a total for the year of $60,000,000, foreign value, or equivalent to about $90,000,000 on the duty-paid home valuation, which is about one-third of the total value of all American wool manufactures as reported in the census of 1890, and considerably more than one-third of the total value of American wool manufactures in the year 1895.

The practical result of the Gorman-Wilson law was thus summarized by the National Association of Wool Manufacturers:

> I. It was argued that the great increase of domestic manufacture, in consequence of free wool, would create so large a demand for domestic wool that the price, instead of falling by the amount of the duty, would increase. The price of wool has not only fallen by the amount of the duty, but it is lower to-day than the foreign prices.
> II. It was argued that free wool, by cheapening the raw material, would greatly lessen the use of shoddy in the United States. There has been more shoddy consumed since this law went into effect than ever before in our experience.
> III. It was argued that free wool would enormously reduce the cost of clothing to the people, on the pretense that the whole of the duty, both on wool and on cloths, was added to the cost of clothing made of domestic goods. It has been found that there has been no substantial reduction in the cost of clothing, grade for grade, beyond the fall in values universal throughout the world; and this for the obvious reason that the costs of distribution, wholesale and retail, have remained fixed, and these costs bear so large a ratio to the total cost of manufacture that the final purchaser of woolens in the form of clothing finds that the reduced cost, due to the removal of the wool duty, when divided up between the wholesaler and retailer, leaves a margin of gain for the consumer so small as to be hardly appreciable.
> IV. It was argued that by reason of the advantage of free raw materials the American manufacturer would find himself not only in full control of the domestic market but actively competing for the markets of the world. We have seen the havoc played with the domestic market. As for the foreign market, it has been practically confirmed, as nearly as can be ascertained, to two cases of woolens shipped to Bradford early in the year, and there discovered by the American consul, who immediately telegraphed to the Secretary of State in Washington that the conquest of the foreign markets had been accomplished. That episode has been the one amusing feature of the whole business.

The Gorman-Wilson law, whatever may have been its motive, actually did result to the great benefit of the wool manufacturers of Europe in the same proportion in which it reduced or ruined the wool and woolen industries of the United States. This historic fact is frankly acknowledged in every European review of the textile market for that time. Helmuth Schwartze & Co.'s annual circular, issued in London for 1895, makes the naive announcement that—

> The dominant factor in the past 12 months has been the recovery and rapid development of the (British) export trade of wool and woolens to the United States under the stimulating influence of free wool and reduced duties on goods.

The British Board of Trade returns showed that in the year 1895 almost the entire increase of exports of British wool manufactures had come in the trade with America. The United States in that year "was the largest customer of Great Britain, taking 24 per cent of her total export of woolens."

The Bradford Observer, in its annual review of the trade for 1895, speaks of the year as "the most extraordinary of the waning century," and calls "the more reasonable tariff adopted by the United States" the most important of the factors which had produced this great boom in British industry.

The London Times, in a review of the British woolen trade, published these words of exaltation over the Democratic tariff:

> There is room for doubt whether outside the West Riding of Yorkshire it is at all generally realized that the year 1895 witnessed a revival in the worsted industry of such magnitude as to be a matter not only for local but for national congratulation. After long years of depression, the varying, sometimes doubtless intermitted, gloom of which had lately become painfully intense, the great manufacturing district of which Bradford is the center was visited last year by the full sunshine of prosperity. * * * Roughly speaking, the Gorman-Wilson tariff, which came into effective operation in the last month of 1894, in place of the strangling system of duties associated with the name of McKinley, reduced the customhouse charges upon the principal products of the Bradford district imported into the States from 100 per cent of their value to 50 per cent. * * *

Thus it came about that the value of worsted coatings imported from the Bradford district into the United States in the first five months of 1895 was more than double that of the like imports during the whole year (December, 1893, to November, 1894), and the value in dollars for the whole of 1895, as compared to the whole of 1894 (years ending September 30), was $7,575,052, against $1,275,626, being an increase of fully 600 per cent.

And this was only one item in the great development received by the reviving industry of Bradford from across the Atlantic. Bradford had for months been able to supply the United States with a large amount of "stuff goods"—a classification embracing fabrics for ladies' dresses, whether of the soft or "bright" descriptions, and materials for use in the linings of both male and female apparel, which are largely made from the glossy yarns of long-stapled wools, woven upon a warp or foundation of cotton. Under this extensive category the imports into America from the Bradford district in the 10 years immediately preceding the McKinley tariff has been maintained at an average value of more than $6,000,000 a year; and in 1890, owing, doubtless, to the anxiety of the merchants to fill up their stocks, it ran up to the very high figure of $10,600,000.

Under the McKinley law the Bradford stuff goods imported into the United States were always under $5,000,000 a year, and in 1894, through the same causes as those accounted for the great falling off of worsted coatings from Bradford, the value sank to little over $2,200,000. Last year it sprang up with a bound to $8,375,000. Much of this great leap was doubtless explicable in the same way as that which occurred in worsted coatings, but in the case of the "stuff goods" there came in that other element, fashion, which 20 years before had operated so injuriously to the trade of Bradford.

What has the future in store? From what has been said it will be seen that there are two main external influences which have a powerful effect on the fortunes of the Bradford trade—tariffs and fashions. As to the first, there is apparently a good deal of reason to fear that in 1897 or 1898 a system of largely enhanced import duties shall be brought into force in the United States. The more clearly assumed that the melancholy anticipation becomes, the larger, let us remember, is likely to be the importation of Bradford goods in America before the new tariff takes effect. But when it takes effect, there must invariably be a heavy drop in that importation. Nothing that Bradford can do can vitally affect the volume of the trade passing from its mills across the Atlantic. That issue rests with American politicians.

Under the McKinley law, the tariff of 1890, the number of sheep in the United States had reached a total of 47,000,000, according to the figures of the Department of Agriculture, and was increasing at about the rate of 1,000,000 a year. These sheep, at an average value of $2.50 a head, were worth in 1892 the sum of $118,000,000. These American sheep were decreasing at the rate of 3,000,000 annually under free wool. Their number had fallen on April 1, 1896, to 36,464,405, with an average value of $1.70 a head. The loss in number was more than 10,000,000 sheep in three years, and in value over $60,000,000. That is what the Gorman-Wilson law had cost American farmers in a single department of their great industry.

Under the McKinley law the wool product of the United States had reached in 1893 a total of 348,500,000 pounds, the largest clip in the history of this country.

The average value of this American wool was not far from 15 cents a pound on the farm, and at this rate the wool clip of 1893 was worth $52,200,000 to the farmers of America. The clip of 1896 was not more than 270,000,000 pounds, and the average farm value was not more than 8 cents a pound, making the total value of the American clip of 1896 not more than $20,800,000, or a loss of 60 per cent to the farmers of this country on their wool alone.

The Quarterly Bulletin of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, in a review (vol. 26) of the effect of Gorman-Wilsonism on the American wool industry at this time, said:

In the bulletin of this association appear the monthly quotations of the prices of 60 different varieties and growths of domestic wools in the Boston markets. Taking these quotations by groups, as they are there arranged, and comparing the prices in April, 1890, with the prices in April, 1896, we have the following results by groups:

	Average price.		Per cent of decline.
	April, 1890.	April, 1896.
Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Michigan, New York, New England, Kentucky, Indiana, and Missouri, 24 varieties, washed and unwashed.....	Cents. 30.3	Cents. 17.4	42.3
Texas, California, Oregon, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, Georgia, and Southern, 26 varieties, scoured.....	49.1	27.4	44.2
Pulled wools, 10 varieties, scoured.....	45.9	28.5	38
Total, 60 varieties.....	40.9	23.5	42.4

The average decline in the whole group is 42 per cent.

No other commodity, raw or manufactured, has suffered a decline in value which approximates this. Its extent and significance may be shown in the specific case of Ohio XX wool. It has dropped in value, in the face of equal competition, from 29 cents in 1892 to 18½ cents per pound in 1896. The 1892 price on the scoured basis was about 28 cents above the value per scoured pound of the London price of the corresponding grade of Australian wool, while the 1896 price is about 4½ cents below the London scoured price of the like grade of Australian wool. This drop of 42 per cent in value represents the loss to the farmer from the repeal of the duty fixed by the McKinley Act. It is not in any sense due to a general decline in the world's wool markets, for a comparison of the London prices of various grades of wool, at the same dates, shows an average advance of about 9 per cent in 1896, as compared with 1892.

The pretense that the woolgrower got no benefit from the tariff on wool has thus been exploded for all time to come. With the obliteration of the theory has come the practical demonstration of the fact that the growing of wool can not be carried on as a profitable industry in this country without some measure of protection. Cheap as is domestic wool to-day, it is not as cheap, when all the conditions of shrinkage are taken into account, as many of the foreign wools which are now everywhere to be found in our markets. As the pressure of these foreign wools increases the prices of domestic wools are destined to fall still lower, in comparison with foreign prices. This is proved by the fact that they can not now be profitably shipped abroad for sale in competition with foreign wools. The experiment has been tried a number of times during the present year, and each time it has proved a failure. Some sale abroad may in time be found, but not at prices that will pay the farmer to export.

Thus it is evident that there is but one customer available for the domestic woolgrower, and that is the American manufacturer. But free wool will deprive him of that single customer. Indeed, this has already occurred in large measure, as is shown by the statistics of wool imports since the removal of the duty. In the first 12 months of free imports, 120,000,000 pounds of clothing wools entered our ports, an increase of over 300 per cent, as compared with the largest imports under duty; and the aggregate imports of all classes reached 250,000,000 pounds, as compared with 175,000,000 pounds in the largest year under dutiable wool. This total came within 20,000,000 pounds of the total production of domestic wool in 1896. If we add to it the rags, noils, wastes, shoddy, and other wool substitutes imported during the same period, we shall have a total about equal to the present year's clip. Very few years of increasing imports and diminishing clip will suffice to place the aggregate imports far above the domestic production. This enormous volume of foreign wool reached this country in a year when the consumption of American manufacturers was below normal quantity, and its presence here, much of it still unconsumed, explains the fact that there has been almost no market for American wools at any price.

The experiment has proved a practical demonstration that the United States must stop growing her own wool, except as a by-product, unless there is a reasonable duty placed upon the wool of countries which can grow it cheaper, because they grow it under conditions of a cheaper civilization. To learn this fact has cost our farmers an annual sum of money greater than the value of the property destroyed in the Boston fire of 1872.

That was the effect upon the farmers and ranchmen, upon the woolgrowers of the country, so far as the Gorman-Wilson tariff was concerned. How about its effect upon the manufactures? On this point the Bulletin of the National Association said:

These two years in which they have had unrestrained and unfettered access to the wools of the world have been the most disastrous in the history of the American wool manufacture, not excepting the collapse that followed the close of the War of 1812 or the panic of 1837 or the panic of 1857. These three occasions have heretofore stood in men's minds for the worst that could happen to this particular industry, in consequence of commercial panic or change in economic law. Neither of them furnishes a standard by which to measure the extent of the present disaster, because at neither period had the wool manufacture reached the relative importance among our national industries it has acquired under 30 years of thorough-going protection.

The disturbance in the industry began far in advance of the actual enactment of the tariff in 1894; the anticipation of the free-listing of wool operated to create a shrinkage in the values of all goods and stocks on hand, which brought them down to the free-wool basis long before the manufacturer could turn about, readjust his business, and make a new start. He received this blow between the eyes before the Wilson bill had even been drafted. It became necessary in every mill in the country to charge off a lump sum—greater or less, according to the amount of goods and stock on hand—a direct loss due to legislation that was only impending, which strained the resources of the most solvent concerns.

The woolen schedule did not go into effect until January 1, 1895, four months after the rest of the tariff bill became operative. In the very first month the true significance of the abandonment of specific duties began to appear. There was no longer any clew to the values which domestic manufacturers must meet to hold their market. All the old standards were broken down. The volume of the imports soon became appalling. * * * It was like the breaking loose of the Johnstown reservoir—it swept everything before it.

* * * The output of American mills was reduced in a larger percentage in 1895 than the imports were increased; to such a degree, in fact, that it is safe to say that nearly one-half of all the woolens which entered into consumption in that year were of foreign manufacture. We have in this country enough woolen machinery to manufacture all the woolen goods our people can consume. But we have no use for it under the present tariff.

Toward the end of the year 1895 production began to decrease, and before the heavy-weight season was over nearly one-half of the machinery employed upon men's wear was idle. In the transition from the heavy-weight to the light-weight season the real condition of the American wool manufacture was for the first time apparent. Many mills shut down entirely; others ran alternate days or half or two-thirds time; still others discharged the half or more of their employees; and with the advance of this summer about 80 per cent of the wool machinery of the country stood idle.

This idleness of American mills under the pressure of huge imports of cheap-wage woolen products from abroad soon bred widespread disaster to the industries of the United States.

To take a mere partial record of the ruin wrought by Gorman-Wilsonism in the year 1896: In January the Halifax Mills, of Laconia, N. H., were attached for $75,000, the machinery was stopped, and the mills were closed. The Saxon Worsted Co., of Providence, R. I., shut its doors and went out of business. The firm of Wilson H. Brown & Co., of Germantown, Pa., was dissolved and merged into the Leicester Mills. The Windermere Mills, in Rockville, Conn., one of the most ancient and famous of American wool-manufacturing towns, were sold for a bicycle factory. The East Pond Manufacturing Co., of Newport, Me., failed. The Saxony Woolen Mill, of Trenton, N. J., and the Earl Knitting Mills, of Northville, N. Y., were closed and disposed of.

In February of that disastrous year the Pioneer Worsted Mill, of Louisville, Ky., was sold; the Standard Worsted Mill, of Lowell, Mass., fell into the hands of the auctioneer; and the Eastlake Woolen Co., of Bridgeton, N. J., was taken over on account of a mortgage. In March the Crane & Waters Mill at Millbury, Mass., was sold, and the Halifax Mills, of New Hampshire, were put up at auction. James Long Bros & Co. and the Angora Mills, of Philadelphia, both assigned.

In April of this Democratic year of 1896 the Lion Knitting Mills, of Cohoes, N. Y., were sold under foreclosure of mortgage. J. C. & J. C. Miller, of Baldwinsville, N. Y., assigned, with liabilities of $500,000. The Allen Woolen Mill, of Hanover, Conn., failed. The Lacon Woolen Manufacturing Co., of Lacon, Ill., was sold, as was the Houlton Woolen Mill, of Houlton, Me. The Hope Mill, of Waterford, N. Y.; the Meyers Hosiery Mill, of Philadelphia; and the Tremont Worsted Co., of Methuen, Mass., assigned; and the Arnold & Perkins Manufacturing Co., of Pascoag, R. I., disposed of its machinery.

In May the Glenmore Worsted Mills, of Philadelphia, were attached; the Hudson Valley Knitting Co., of Amsterdam, N. Y., failed, and had its stock sold out by the sheriff. In June the Nonamtum Worsted Mills, of Newton, Mass., failed, and the Everett Woolen Mills were sold in Great Barrington, Mass. In July the Empire State Knitting Mills, of Schenectady, N. Y., assigned, and its stock and plant were disposed of for what they would bring. There was a sale also of the Spencer Woolen Mill, of Spencer, Mass. The record of this month is full of other failures, sales, and reorganizations in the woolen business.

All of this time the woolen and worsted factories of England, the great beneficiaries of the Gorman-Wilson legislation, were working overtime with their cheap labor on goods for the American markets and were enjoying a prosperity which the Bradford Observer well calls "the most extraordinary of the waning century." But there was a grim difference in the United States. In August the Brooklyn Knitting Mill, of Brooklyn, N. Y., failed. The Franklin Woolen Co., of Jackson, Ohio, failed. So did Davis, Russel & Co., of Phoenixville, Pa., and the Hampshire Blanket Co., of Williamsburg, Mass. The Dubois Knitting Mill Co., of Dubois, Pa., went into voluntary liquidation. In September the New Albany Woolen Mills, of New Albany, Ind., failed, and the property was sold at auction. The American Wool & Felt Manufacturing Co., of Kansas City, Mo., was attached; the Rose Valley Woolen Co., of Auburn, N. Y., failed, and the Enterprise Knitting Mill, of Cohoes, N. Y., was sold under foreclosure of a mortgage. A little later the Albany Woolen Mills, of Albany, Oreg., went into the hands of a receiver, and the Kennebec Woolen Mills, of Philadelphia, assigned with liabilities of $70,000. The Anchor Knitting Mills were bought in by the mortgagee. The great carpet factory of Alexander Smith & Sons' Co., at Yonkers, N. Y., closed down for the time being, because it could not find the market for its products, which were piling up in the storehouses while foreign goods were pouring into the country.

This is how the Gorman-Wilson law—a more favorable law by far to American manufacturers than this new Democratic proposal—dealt with the manufacturers and the wage earners of the United States. It meant idleness, loss, bankruptcy, starvation for them, and high, exultant prosperity for their competitors in Europe.

Gentlemen of the committee, it is my prediction that if this proposed measure is enacted into law the growers of wool and the raisers of sheep will again suffer an inestimable financial loss, as was the case under the so-called Wilson-Gorman Tariff Act of 1894, which is so fresh in the memories of the people then trying to make a living by the raising of sheep and wool.

The woolgrower of the United States has no other market for his product than the woolen manufacturer of the United States. The two industries, woolgrowing and wool manufacturing, go hand in hand. One can not succeed without the other. The woolen manufacturers can not possibly survive without adequate protection against foreign wools produced cheaper than American wools can be produced. One of two things must happen if this measure becomes a law—the woolen manufacturers of the United States must go into bankruptcy or the labor employed, both in the production of wool and the manufacturing of the same, must be reduced to a level with labor employed not only in England, but in the Orient.

Our Democratic friends hold out the hope and the sop to the consumers of woolen clothing that if the duty on wool and woolens is reduced the laboring man will obtain his clothing just that much cheaper, but they should also add this statement, that there never was a time in our history when the laboring man for his week's wages could purchase more woolen clothing than he can to-day. The clothing, the food, and all the necessaries and comforts of life enjoyed by the laboring men of this country are measured by his purchasing power. If low prices on manufactured and agricultural articles prevail on account of greater importations of those articles from abroad, the result is inevitable—the wages of the labor producing such articles in this country must be lowered and the amount of employment offered to American labor reduced, for the greatest evidence that our industries have been transferred abroad is the fact proven by heavy importations.

In concluding I wish to submit some instructive figures showing the decline in the number of sheep in the United States during the operation of the Wilson-Gorman tariff law. The figures explain themselves:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if there is any necessity——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that there is an amendment now pending.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if there was any question as to the necessity of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to perfect this bill, it seems to me it has been entirely removed by the reading of the court decisions by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. Chairman, I urge this amendment, not as one hostile to the bill, but as one who intends to vote for it and wishes to perfect it so far as possible. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These decisions that were read by the gentleman from Massachusetts amount simply to this: That in the law then being construed there were two conflicting provisions, one laying a duty upon articles made wholly or in part of wool, and another laying certain duties upon articles where the component part of chief value was a certain material. Now, it is a familiar rule in the construction of statutes that specific provisions must control and govern general language, and all that the court decided in that case was that the provision "component part of chief value" was more specific than the provision "wholly or in part of wool." And so the decision was made, and it could not have been otherwise.

But I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is an entirely different case. I submit that no one can cite any authority holding that general language in a subsequent statute does not control and govern specific language in any prior statute.

And so the construction of this bill must be—indeed, there is no room for construction, because it is so plain—that if it passes in its present form all articles of wool or partly of wool not otherwise provided for in this bill will come in under a 40 per cent ad valorem duty.

Mr. Chairman, what will be the result of that? Turn to the silk schedule, for instance. The duties in that schedule run from 60 to 128 per cent where the material consists of 30 per cent or more of silk. These are all luxuries. You will reduce the tariff on these luxuries, now ranging from 60 to 130 per cent, where they contain a small part of wool, down to 40 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that a part of your scheme of tariff revision, to reduce the duties upon luxuries?

Take the other extreme. Turn to the cotton schedule, and we have there duties running from 27 per cent up. With the construction that will follow in this bill, in certain kinds of cotton, where the duty is now 27, 30, or 35 per cent for cheap goods, matters of necessity to the common people, if they are composed in part of wool you propose to increase the duties upon those articles to 40 per cent ad valorem. Is that part of your policy of tariff revision?

Mr. Chairman, it seems so clear to me that this amendment is necessary that I say in the utmost good faith to gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber they ought to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 119.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the words "ad valorem" in line 19, page 2: "Provided, That all worsted coatings, serges, and suitings for men's wear, and all worsted-filling cassimeres, doeskins, jeans, tweeds, coatings, suitings, and other cotton-warp goods for men's wear shall be admitted free of duty."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have in this amendment attempted to reach that variety of worsted goods which go on a man's back. There are two kinds of worsted goods for men's wear. One is an all-wool worsted and the other is a wool-filled worsted, the warp being of cotton and the filling of wool.

We make in woolen fabrics in this country about 510,000,000 square yards. Of that amount 210,000,000 square yards are worsted, but apparently only 59,000,000 square yards of worsted, all wool, reach the backs of men in this country for clothing, and only about 16,000,000 square yards of cotton warp and woolen filling. In other words, the amendment which I have offered reaches 75,000,000 square yards of worsted fabrics.

I want to say to the House again that I am perfectly aware that there is no disposition on the part of this committee to amend this bill. It is my belief that there will be no wool legislation in the Sixty-second Congress, but I predict to all in this House that whether the Republicans or the Democrats are in control in the Sixty-third Congress, worsted fabrics for men's wear will go on the free list.

It is no new thing to put worsted fabrics on the free list. They were on the free list in most of the tariffs before the Civil War.

In the law of 1867 they were given the preference of a tariff, a tariff which they enjoyed for almost half a century, save for one short period, and I want to take a moment to point out that period. We passed an act in 1883 which reduced the duty on worsteds, and that duty remained in the law for seven years. The worsted industry did not decline, it did not suffer, it was not put out of business; it went ahead and enjoyed a normal growth. Now here is a scene which occurred in this Hall on May 9, 1890, and I commend it to my friends. This resolution was passed:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to classify as woolen cloths all imports of worsted cloth, whether known under the name of worsted cloth or under the names of worsteds or diagonals or otherwise.

It is an interesting incident which I commend to my friends in the House of Representatives, that it passed by 138 yeas, with 189 Members present in addition and not voting.

Now, the worsted trust has enjoyed all sorts of favors in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, here is a proposition to admit free merely the worsted fabrics that are worn by the average citizen of the United States. It will not materially affect your revenues. There are other ways of getting revenue. It will, so far as the tariff can, bring relief, partial relief to men who wear worsted in this country. And I have no doubt that if the gentlemen of the majority in this House had not subscribed to the caucus that they would vote this amendment up and in.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have listened, Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of pleasure and instruction to the debate on the woolen schedule. I have become thoroughly satisfied that wool occupies the important position that a great Republican gave it, as being the "key of the arch of protection." No schedule on the tariff list so clearly draws the lines of demarkation between the policies and principles of two great political parties of this country—the Democratic and the Republican Parties—as does the tariff on wool. Why this is true can hardly be told, but yet, 'tis true. I dare say that never before in the history of this country has the interest and attention of the American people been more intensely focused on the tariff, and especially now on wool.

The Republican Party, that for more than 16 years has bestowed its most valuable special favors of the wool and woolen interests to enrich a class, has been overthrown in the popular branch of the Government, and the overthrow at the polls, in public estimation, is chiefly attributable to the dictation of the Association of Wool Manufacturers of Maine—woolen schedule—which the Republican Party openly admitted on the floor of the House in its pretended revision in 1909 was too strong to resist, and placidly yielded to the continuance of its enormities on the American people.

No beneficial change scarcely of any character in the woolen schedule was made in the law of 1897 by the Payne-Aldrich law of 1909. The Republican Party possessed a guilty knowledge of the inordinate exaction concealed in the bewildering classifications of Schedule K. The clamor that came up from the people everywhere against these excessive tax burdens went unheeded and unnoticed. Mr. Taft, while Secretary of War, said in a speech he delivered on September 5, 1906, at Bath, Me.:

Speaking my individual opinion, and for no one else, I believe that since the passage of the Dingley bill there has been a change in the business conditions of the country, making it wise and just to revise the existing tariff. The sentiment in favor of a revision of the tariff is growing in the Republican Party, and in the near future the members of the party will doubtless be able to agree on a reasonable plan. * * * How soon the feeling in favor of revision shall crystallize into action can not be foretold, but it is certain to come, and with it those schedules of the tariff which have inequalities and are excessive will be readjusted.

"How soon the feeling in favor of revision shall crystallize into action can not be foretold." The tariffs which have "inequalities and are excessive" will be readjusted. How long and patiently the people were fed on such political chaff! But were the "inequalities" and "excessive" duties readjusted? Were they reduced, as Mr. Taft promised in his Bath speech?

I quote this clipping for the purpose of showing that the Republican Party was warned as to what the people expected and demanded in the reduction of tariff duties. Some time after this, when Mr. Taft had been elected President on the platform adopted at the Republican national convention of 1908, in making a speech at Milwaukee in September, 1908, he said:

I expect to recommend to Congress a genuine and honest revision of the tariff.

Then, after Mr. Taft was elected President, in making a speech on December 16, 1908, to the Ohio Society of New York City, in speaking of the pledge of his party:

On this plank we were successful; and unless we act in accordance with our promises, or if we only keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope, we shall be made accountable to the American people and suffer such consequences as failure to keep faith has always been visited with. Better to have no revision at all unless we are going to honestly and faithfully revise the tariff on the basis promised by our party.

These are the utterances of your President—a Republican. He believed that the pledge and promise made in the Republican platform was to reduce excessive rates. He was honest, innocent, and guileless then. He had a suspicion then that the standpatters of his party were "fooling" and so they were.

But my purpose is to call attention of the committee to a strange and apparently meaningless sentence at the close of the minority report of the members of the Ways and Means Committee. It is as follows:

For purely political reasons this cold-blooded measure is brought forward.

Think of it—"cold blooded." If the old adage is to prevail, "That you judge the force of the shot by the fluttering of the birds," then this wool bill as presented has done irreparable damage in the ranks of the Republican Party.

The Democrats who are guiding us in this Congress are not denying that there is just as much politics in the air all around us as can well be. You know this is a fact and we know it on this side of the Chamber. But you forget one important fact, that this "cold-blooded measure" receives from the masses of the people this encomium, "that he who serves his party best serves his country best." I speak for myself when I say that no House of Representatives has assembled in Washington for the last half century that is charged more decidedly with the responsibility of shaping legislation that would give victory or defeat next year to the Democracy than the present Democratic House. We are bringing Schedule K up now because it is more oppressive on the people than any other tariff schedule.

And again I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I recognize the presentation and discussion of the wool schedule at this time as the most auspicious event in the struggle we are making for our party. It gives us the welcomed opportunity on a subject of universal interest to show and convince the country that the Democratic Party does not propose to be rash and reckless in handling the great interests of our country. We recognize that the demand for a reduction of the excessive tariff duties imposed and enforced by the Republican Party in the woolen schedule, but in cotton cloth and many other articles, exists among patriotic and unselfish citizens of all classes throughout the country, and a true utterance of that demand was recorded by the election last November.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that his motion is in the nature of an amendment in the third degree, but I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, to continue.

The people will bear patiently with a work the result of thoughtful care and prudence, while they will become angry and condemn inconsiderate, reckless party action. I realize and appreciate the fact that raw wool is lustily declared by some to be the first and most important subject worthy of the free list. Under certain conditions that would be true, but those conditions do not exist now. This woolen schedule and the action of a Democratic caucus on the same, which action will be ratified on the floor of the House in a few hours, indicate to the country that no change will be made which of itself will cause any sudden or violent interruption or readjustment of business interests of the country. Under the policy of the Republican Party of building up great business combines by special favors and preferences under the tariff schedules large amounts of capital have been accumulated and invested. We can not afford to so handle most large interests with such disregard as would bring on a business convulsion by attempting to undo all of that by one stroke. We could not have satisfied our political opponents as much in any other way as by putting raw wool on the free list.

Speaking alone for myself, I believe it is politically wise for our party to establish a national policy for the laying and collection of tariff duties based on revenue which will remove the menace that at every national election confronts our industrial system, which paralyzes business. It can not be denied that the Republican policy of excessive prohibitive duties has invited the economic and industrial agitations that we have suffered from for many years past. And they will continue just as long as our people are willing to have their money taken by the Government from them under the guise of law to create wealth and power for a favored class. This woolen, more than any other tariff, offends in that way. It has been truly declared that the woolen schedule was the key to the arch of protection. No one can fairly claim that if the policy of a tariff for revenue is made our national policy that any great injury will result to our home industries by a gradual adjustment. It is manifest that the interests of labor has been used by the Republican Party to conceal its real purpose of unjust gains for the manufacturer. The manufacturer nor the laborer will suffer under the economic and just policy of a tariff for revenue.

In this tariff on raw wool, imposed, as I believe, in good faith, for revenue and in strict accord with the fundamental Democratic creed and without directly or indirectly contravening any Democratic platform for revenue, we are bound to know that such a tariff carries with it a limited protection to home industries.

Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that we could not have given more genuine political satisfaction to our political opponents than by putting raw wool on the free list. They would have lustily charged us with abandoning the Treasury of the Government by placing an article on the free list that annually yielded millions of revenue to aid in bearing the expenses of the Government.

We have correspondingly disappointed them by placing on raw wool a tariff of 20 per cent, something less than one-half of the tariff under the present law. This woolen schedule and our surroundings makes us hopeful that the National Democratic Party is on its way back to its great and fundamental principles, the assertion and adherence to which has made the Democratic Party the great party of this country, that truly represents the interests of the masses against the grasping greed of the classes. "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

Mr. Taft, in speaking of the evils of the protective policy of the Republican Party for past years, said in his letter to the Republican national congressional committee, under date of August 20, 1910:

> The evil of excessive tariff rates, however, showed itself in the temptation of manufacturers to combine and suppress competition, and then to maintain the prices so as to take advantage of the excess of the tariff rate over the difference between the cost of production abroad and here.

The wool schedule was manipulated in the way the President described, and for years millions have been extorted from the people to enrich a class favored by the Republican Party. The President declared himself that the wool schedule was "indefensible." That is strong language. The wool duties are hoary with age. If we subject it to fair and equitable rule of law the arch of protection is weakened.

I think this a suitable occasion to congratulate the Democratic leaders of the House that they have laid down such a wise, discreet program as the business of this special session and the manner it is being carried out gives cheer and great stimulus and hope to our party. We do not mean to go into the shop and destroy all of the cutlery. What we want to get is the confidence of the people, which the Democratic Party needs, and we have the opportunity at this time of getting that. That is what we need more than anything else. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SULZER). An amendment is pending, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the other day, in an address to the House, I referred to a suit of clothes made from a piece of cloth manufactured in a mill in Rhode Island. The cost of that cloth laid down by the manufacturer was $7.87½. I emphasize the cost price of the cloth, for it contained 3½ yards, sufficient to make a suit of clothes. It was laid down by the manufacturer at $7.87½. It was American-made cloth, with all of the tariff charges and all of the manufacturer's charges, and all of the woolgrower's charges, and all the mill worker's charges paid. That piece of cloth was taken to a tailor, who made it up into a suit of clothes, for which he charged me $30. I took the cloth to the tailor because I wanted to find out who paid the tariff on it. I wanted to find out where the consumer was hit by the tariff on the purchase of the finished garment.

DRAWING THE TAILOR'S FIRE.

I have drawn the fire of the tailor who made the suit. He does not agree with me upon the question of the tariff, and still insists that it is an iniquity, although the tariff charges upon that $7.87½ piece of cloth, if imported, would have been $3.92. My speech attracted some attention in the newspapers, and has invited an answer from the tailor. I have his letter before me. In it he gives some figures that I desire to lay before the House.

Here is the letter:

PHILADELPHIA, June 15, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: I have read with more than ordinary interest your remarks upon the revision of the woolen schedule as reported to-day in the Public Ledger, and especially that portion which refers to the conversation with your tailor. I recall the conversation perfectly, but as quoted there is such an unfair impression created regarding tailors' prices and profits, that knowing you as well as I do, I am sure you would not intentionally or deliberately be a party to making that kind of an impression.

I want the privilege of submitting the following facts and data to illuminate the subject which will probably interest yourself and the House as well as the public, and authorize you to use them, if you see fit to do so.

Taking up the price of $30, which you paid me for making, cutting, and fitting the suit in question, I submit the following figures of costs:

Wages paid pieceworkers on coat, vest, and trousers	$12.50
Wages paid weekly and yearly workers	6.50
Paid for material (trimmings)	4.50
Gross profits (21½ per cent)	6.50
Total	30.00

LABOR WAS PAID ITS SHARE.

You will notice that $19 was paid to labor alone in the first two items. Trimmings cost include mohair lining, canvas, linens, silk, cottons, and various other sundries which paid duty to the Government or were manufactured in this highly protected country. Lastly, gross profits of $6.50 includes cost of doing business, such as rent, general expense, advertising, insurance, interest on capital, and also net profit for the man who runs the business, which includes his labor or services. Now, as a manufacturing business which requires, as the tailoring business does, highly skilled operatives, does it strike you that we are the "robber barons"? It must also be remembered that a tailor working organization must be kept together for 12 months in the year, while the public has use for him about 7 months. He can not hibernate the other 5 months while the public won't buy, because they don't need him—it is a business of seasons, and we must live on such net surplus as remains after paying the foregoing costs referred to out of the 21½ per cent gross profit. A department store, whose business never stops a day during the year, will not try to do business for a gross profit of less than 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent, while the tailor gets less than 25 per cent, being due to the fact that his labor cost and his woolen or trimming charges are so great that he can not put so large a percentage of profit and sell his goods.

In the matter of cost of the cloth in the suit you mention, assuming that it is accurately quoted as $7.87½, I have handled, bought, and sold woolens for about 30 years and make this statement, to which I challenge contradiction, that no tailor in the United States can buy the cloth in your suit for $7.87½ in a regular way. I doubt whether a clothing manufacturer would be able to buy it for $2.75 per yard by the piece of 35 to 40 yards.

I do not know anything about the profits of the woolen jobber, but the price you quote—$2.25—for your cloth at the mill and the price the tailor pays before it reaches the final consumer, opens up a very interesting vista.

I write you in the interest of fair play—which I know you stand for—taking up only the tailor's side of the case, who in the past few years has become a much abused and long suffering manufacturing tradesman, whose profits the public say are large, but the aforesaid tradesman all over this country is in most cases making but his living, and is losing his eyesight looking for the "big profits."

As a tailor I favor a moderate revision of the tariff on woolens, but the present Schedule K is a monstrous injustice to the public and the tailor.

Yours, faithfully and sincerely,

W. H. DIXON, Merchant Tailor.

THIS LABOR WAS PROTECTED.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only five minutes, under the rule, in which to make this talk. In my speech the other day I called for an explanation of the $30 charge for making up a suit out of a $7.87½ piece of cloth. Notwithstanding Mr. Dixon's statement, this was very high-priced American cloth. Now, my answer comes in the letter just quoted. It fully supports the contention I have been making that the tariff has little or nothing to do with the price to the consumer in the protection of $3.92 lodged at the customhouse against that $7.87½ worth of cloth. The American woolgrower was benefited and every workman, from the man who sorted the wool up through the scouring, carding, combing, dyeing, and finishing process to the weaving and delivery of the woven cloth, was protected. Our quarrel with the tariff, if we had any, was up to this point and no further, except as it may have affected tailors' trimmings.

Now, what does the tailor say in justification of the $30 charge? He says substantially what the manufacturer said: "I did not get it." Where, then, did it go? Let Mr. Dixon answer:

Piece wageworkers	$12.50
Wage earners regularly employed	6.50
Total labor cost	19.00

There is my whole argument. Labor was taken care of in the transaction and had to be taken care of before the finished garment was delivered. I was willing to pay that $30, including the tailor's profit of $6.50, because I preferred to pay the American wage and encourage American industries all along the line, from the woolgrower to the merchant tailor. If I had purchased that suit in England under similar circumstances the cloth could have been obtained for the $7.87½, minus the tariff of $3.92, but there would have been a displacement of all the American labor in all the branches of industry that engaged in the production and manufacture of the cloth, and I would have obtained the suit, so far as the tailor was concerned, for one-half his $19 labor cost, or $9.50, since labor receives one-half the wage in England it receives in the United States.

ALL BRANCHES OF THE INDUSTRY INVOLVED.

I have no fault to find with the profit of $6.50 made by the American tailor on this suit of clothes, nor on the $19 paid for labor in making up the suit, for I presume that is a fair American wage, but I do find fault with the Democratic Party and all others who are depressing wool prices, and wages, and who seek to break down the tariff barriers and remove protection to American labor by charging unjustly that the manufacturer is the only beneficiary of the protective system. I think I have shown that you can not strike the manufacturer without also carrying down the woolgrower, the workingman in the mill, and even the merchant tailor. In the instance of this suit of clothes we have seen that the tariff helped to keep employed woolgrowers, woolsorters, scourers, carders, combers, dyers, weavers, and finishers, and that, in addition to them, it protected wage earners employed by the merchant tailor, including cutters, seamstresses, and other skilled labor. We have also seen that the profit of the cloth manufacturer upon this particular piece of goods was 10 cents a yard, or 35 cents for the entire piece, and that notwithstanding the suggestion that there may be middlemen who enhance the price of the cloth, as between the cloth maker and the tailor, the profit of the latter, including his overhead charges, was $6.50, as against the cloth manufacturer's profit of 35 cents, the tariff being against the cloth man and not up to the tailor at all.

TIME FOR DISCUSSION LIMITED.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object to my good friend having one more minute, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Five minutes! The gentleman from Mississippi would not be satisfied with one minute on a matter of this importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to serve notice now——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say now I serve notice——

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Chairman, in view of the letter already introduced, I shall have to content myself by extending in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Nathan H. Folwell, president of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, and a large manufacturer himself, which gives the other side of this question. I have a sample of the pure worsted cloth referred to in Mr. Folwell's letter, quoted at substantially $1.10 per yard for tailor's purposes. I think most anybody would be glad to wear it, especially if made up into women's dress goods, and, as a rule, women do not pay less than their husbands for what they wear.

A MANUFACTURER GIVES PRICES.

FOLWELL BRO. & CO.,
Philadelphia, June 19, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the request of Mr. John P. Wood I send you a sample of our fancy worsted, 58 inches wide, 9 to 9½ ounces, with the detailed cost of the same of $0.966.

We are willing to take orders on these goods at (net cash)	$1.1025
The cost of selling these goods is 6 per cent	.06615
Which would net us	1.03635
Deducting the cost of the same	.966
Total	.07035

These figures are based on the present cost of wool, which, on account of the tariff agitation, is very much below the foreign cost with the duty added.

Prior to this tariff agitation wool here brought the same price as foreign wool with the duty added. Then the goods cost us $1.1125.

We sold them at	$1.2825
Less the cost of selling, 6 per cent	.0769
Which would net us	1.20555

or less than 7½ per cent on the selling price.

You can make use of these figures if you wish to combat the ideas of Mr. UNDERWOOD that we are trying to rob the consumers.

Truly, yours,

N. T. FOLWELL.

P. S.—From the above you see we make less than 10 cents per yard.

PERCENTAGES OF COST.

FOLWELL, BRO. & CO.,
Philadelphia, June 19, 1911.

Mr. N. T. FOLWELL,
625 Chestnut Street.

DEAR SIR: I inclose you a detailed statement of the cost of our No. 410 X, 58-inch, fancy worsted. The warp in these goods being made from 50 per cent of 10s domestic wool and 50 per cent of 7s domestic wool. The filling being of 7s. The 10s represent a full blood X wool and the 7s represent a one-half blood.

I have carefully gone into the various items entering into the cost of these goods, and find them to be as follows:

Sixty per cent in cost of materials.

Twenty-six per cent in wages.

Fourteen per cent in fixed charges, which represents interest on capital, rent of our buildings, motive power, and all supplies used in making the yarns, dyeing, etc.

I also inclose you the wool tests which show you the shrinkage actually made on these goods. These items represent the data collected in making thousands of these pieces, showing the same to be correct.

Trusting this is what you require, I am,

Very truly, yours,

MITCHELL STEAD.

FOLWELL, BRO. & CO.,
Philadelphia, June 19, 1911.

COST OF NO. 410 X, 58-INCH, FANCY WORSTED, WEIGHING 9½ OUNCES PER YARD.

Expenses	$31.50
Materials (yarns)	358.85
Weaving wages	31.50
Dressing	6.00
Mending	10.00
Finishing	20.00

A total of $457.85 for 500 yards, or 92 cents per yard.

Add to this 5 per cent for damages, returns for all causes, and for cancellations, making an actual cost of 96.60 cents per yard.

WHERE IS THE "ROBBER BARON"?

Recurring to the statement of Mr. Dixon, the tailor, that the tailor's gross profit of $6.50 on a suit of clothes does not make the tailor a "robber baron," I invite a comparison of that profit with the profit of 35 cents to the cloth maker on the 3½ yards in question, and ask wherein the cloth manufacturer, who has taken greater risks in the construction of his mill and in the employment of so many more people than the tailor employs, is a "robber baron"? Mr. Folwell's figures, just given, indicate that he is willing to sell all the "fancy worsted" above described at substantially $1.10 per yard. Three and one-half yards of this material, if used for the purpose, would make a suit of clothes. The total cloth cost is thus shown to be $3.85. May I ask, in view of the fact that this is the material which the tariff protected, what the retail department store would charge for a suit of clothes ready made from such material? Does any one contend for a moment that such a suit could be purchased for less than $12 or $15, or even $20 or $25? Or can anyone tell what the merchant tailor would charge above the cloth price of $3.85? I have said repeatedly, and I say it again, that the "iniquitous" tariff to which Mr. Dixon, the tailor, still objects is all within the $3.85, and before he appears upon the scene, as it were. Everything above that figure, except tailors' trimmings, is subject to employment, tailor's charges and American wages. Or, to make the matter still more plain, the "robber baron," if there be any, is hidden in the $3.85 only. The Democratic Party apparently sees no "robber baron" in the difference between the $3.85 and the ready-made dealer's price of $15 or $20, or the tailor's charge of anything all the way up to $75.

BETWIXT CLOTH AND CONSUMER.

In my address before this House on June 14 last I exhibited samples of American-made cloth having the benefit of the protective tariff, which were quoted for 3½ yards at $3.93, $4.29, and $4.38. I stated then, and I repeat, that many manufacturers would gladly agree to make that material on long-term contracts for a profit of 5 cents a yard, or 17½ cents for the suit, as against the tailor's profit of $6.50, more or less, for making up the suit. I stated that yarn makers were willing to take contracts to deliver yarns at a profit of 5 cents a pound. Now comes the Folwell statement, above quoted, which shows that with regard to the cloth exhibited his concern is willing to sell it at $1.10 per yard. The manufacturer's net profit is less than 10 cents per yard.

AMERICAN WORKERS DID THE WORK.

In this instance, and upon examining the statement with regard to the cost of this particular fancy worsted, we find that 60 per cent is in materials, 26 per cent in wages, and 14 per cent in fixed charges. As to the 60 per cent in cost of materials, we find upon closer examination that "materials" means wool produced by the American woolgrower at American prices, sorted by American sorters, scoured by American scourers, carded by American carders, combed by American combers, spun by American spinners, dyed, finished, and woven by American operatives in those grades, and that all these have to be considered and accounted for before the manufacturer can come out with his profit of less than 10 cents per yard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in making this statement I am not pleading the cause of the manufacturer so much as I am pleading the cause of the American farmer and the American workman. If you are going to transplant all this business to the other side of the water, you are not smiting the manufacturer with more severity than you will smite the farmer and the industrial worker. If the price of cloth is high to the consumer, you have not developed a remedy in your attack upon the protective-tariff system. Neither will you reduce the price of clothing without reducing the power of the wage-earning consumer to purchase clothing. There is ample precedent for this statement.

DO PRICES COME DOWN? NO.

We levied a duty once upon coffee, but we took it away upon the theory that the consumer would get coffee cheaper. The consumer not only failed to get coffee cheaper, but the Brazilian Government matched our generosity in taking off the American tariff by imposing a Brazilian export duty. Brazil took for its treasury what we rejected from ours and the consumer paid the same old price for coffee. There is no duty upon tea, and yet tea comes into the United States at as low as 7 and 11 cents a pound. No labor is employed upon tea in this country, and yet the price of tea is just as high to the consumer as it ever was. The truth is that if we were to levy a duty upon tea and make the importer pay that duty, we would still get tea at the same old price. Instead of the importer getting the duty, as he does now, in effect, it would go into the Treasury of the United States and relieve people of the direct taxation which the Democratic Party is aiming to impose upon them.

I shall be very much mistaken, Mr. Chairman, if the passage of this wool bill does not work injury in industrial districts throughout the country. It certainly holds out no promise of cheaper clothing, while it does anticipate a lowering in the prices of American wool and a depression in the wage-earning power of the textile worker. Such depression is to be deplored, and the pretense of "finding revenue" for the Government, when the Republican Party has provided revenue without depression, is inexcusable.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. On blankets and flannels, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That on flannels composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at above 50 cents per pound, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have not been present during the debate, being compelled to be away, but it was my wish to get 20 minutes by taking 10 on the last paragraph and 10 on this one. Perhaps I shall not need it, but I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee for just a moment and also the attention of members of the committee to these two paragraphs. In paragraph 6 there is a duty of 30 per cent on some flannels and 45 per cent on others. I recognize the justice of that grading, that there should be two or more grades of duty according to the grade of material, but what I want to know, if the gentleman will kindly answer, is why the gentleman did not make a similar grading of duties on cloths in the previous paragraph. Will the gentleman kindly give me that information?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that the committee, having adopted an ad valorem rate all through the bill that rises and falls with the value of goods, concluded that the ad valorem rate would adjust itself without having to make a specific change.

Mr. HILL. Would it not adjust itself as well in blankets as cloths?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When it came to blankets, we did not desire to put an ad valorem higher than 30 per cent on blankets, including with blankets the very cheapest class of flannels. On the higher flannels there had to be some adjustment, and we made that adjustment on that line for the purpose of making the higher flannels pay the higher duty and getting that much more revenue.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I supposed that would be the answer. There never was a greater fallacy submitted to the American people than just that. Now, let me say that I noticed when I was on the floor before that the statement met with considerable applause that I voted for a free list so far as Canadian reciprocity was concerned. I hold now in my hand a report made by myself to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means two years ago recommending an ad valorem duty on wool that should be 40 or 50 per cent, with complete schedules on fabrics based on each duty, and I can give no better statement of my views of what a wool duty should be than is found in that report. I do not believe in a specific duty on wool. I believe that a specific duty on wool in the grease is a fraud and a delusion. I believe it should either be ad valorem or that it should be a specific duty on clean wool, as advocated by the chairman of our committee. So much for that. Now, then, in regard to the answer which the gentleman from Alabama has made, that he thought than an ad valorem duty would adjust itself, I am fully satisfied that he believes that that is correct; but I call his attention to his own report, issued under his own name, on page 10, and I ask the Members of the House who have the report before them to examine it as I take it up.

It gives the cost as far as labor is concerned in 70 establishments in the United States and in a certain number in Great Britain on cotton. It gives also the comparative labor costs on woolen, and then it goes on and it shows that the whole idea of this committee in framing this bill has been founded upon an absolute mistake, and a mistake which was made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Minnesota when he made the statement that if the cost of labor in the United States is 50 per cent and in a foreign country is 25 per cent, a duty of 25 per cent will equalize it. No such thing at all, in any way, shape, or manner. The committee are laboring under the same mistake. Now, then, I will read:

If foreign goods had no labor cost whatever, 27 per cent would have been the maximum average rate required to equalize the labor cost of production at home and abroad.

Now, that is not true. The difference in percentage would have been precisely in the proportion that the total foreign cost was to the total American cost.

Let me illustrate: Suppose the English cost was 50 cents a yard and the American cost $1 a yard. In this citation the American labor cost is 27 per cent and the English labor cost is nothing. Twenty-seven per cent of a dollar is 27 cents, and nothing on the other side. The percentage of duty required to equalize the difference in labor would be 54 per cent, for the duty is laid against the cost of the foreign fabric.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, is objection made?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. There will be no more extensions to-day, Mr. Chairman, if objection is made. I have not been here for two weeks, being away because of the advice of my physician.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by striking out on lines 1 to 5, the following language:

"On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this act, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem."

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer is designed to place the same duty upon women's and children's dress goods as it does upon cloths for men's goods. That has already been passed at 40 per cent, and this amendment proposes to make 40 per cent on the cloth used by women and children. It also leaves out the language in this act, "not specially provided for."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Take the next illustration: There the American labor cost is 27 per cent and the English is 13½ per cent, and the conclusion drawn is as follows:

Then the rate of duty required to prevent the foreign manufacturer from securing an advantage from cheaper labor would have been 27 per cent as to cotton manufactures, and the American cost, less 13½ per cent, would have been the European cost, or 13½ per cent.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] made the same mistake which the average man would make unless he had thoroughly analyzed the proposition, namely, that 50 per cent of American cost as against 25 per cent of English cost meant 25 per cent difference. It does not. It is dependent entirely on the respective valuations of the products. Thirteen and one-half per cent of 50 per cent is about 6¾ per cent, 27 per cent of a dollar is 27 cents, and the difference is a trifle over 20 cents, so that it requires 40 per cent duty on the foreign fabric to equalize the labor alone. Now, you will find that mistake carried all through the report, and you have practically figured the protective feature of this bill by applying the duty to the American cost, whereas it is a well-known fact outside of Congress that the rate of duty is laid upon the foreign product and not upon the American product. I had supposed it was understood so in Congress. If you will turn to page 41 you will find you have made the same mistake. I do not know who drew this report. I do not care. It is absolutely wrong in its mathematics. You there provide, "labor, 25 per cent; material, 60 per cent; interest and depreciation, 7½ per cent; and all other charges, 7½ per cent;" and then the man who drew this report made this wise comment:

The present protection on the cloth before mentioned, equivalent to 78 per cent, is therefore more than three times the labor cost, and almost as much as the entire cost in labor and materials.

There is no truth in that. It is absolutely a mistake. It is 78 per cent applied to one principal; 25 per cent is applied to another. Of course 78 is more than 3 times 25, but on the basis of your own figures 25 per cent of $1.30, the American cost, is 34½ cents, and 78 per cent on your 77 cents, which is the English cost, is nowhere near twice, to say nothing about three times, as much.

Now, reading this over as I sat on my piazza during the last week, I wondered to myself how I could show to this House of Representatives that the application of an ad valorem duty, which I believe in, on textiles—do not misunderstand me—how the application of an ungraded ad valorem duty would utterly fail to compensate for the difference in the cost of production; and if my friend from Illinois would pardon me and give me five minutes, I would like to show to this House the absolute failure of the single ad valorem proposition submitted in this bill by a practical illustration, which I think would be exceedingly interesting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I shall speak further, then, on the next amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the words "ad valorem," in line 5, page 3, the following:

"Provided, That all worsted dress goods, cashmeres, serge, and other worsted goods for women's and children's wear, and all worsted filling dress goods, delaines, cashmeres, serges, mohairs, and alpacas, and other stuffs for women's and children's wear, shall be admitted free of duty."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment covers all the dress goods for women's and children's wear which are of worsted. They are in large measure produced by a trust, and I wish to read in my time the platform of the Democratic Party adopted at its last national convention as it relates to the matter of trust-controlled products. The plaform on the tariff is as follows:

We welcome the belated promise of tariff reform now offered by the Republican Party as a tardy recognition of the righteousness of the Democratic position on this question; but the people can not safely intrust the execution of this important work to a party which is so deeply obligated to the highly protected interests as is the Republican Party. We call attention to the significant fact that the promised relief is postponed until after the coming election—an election to succeed in which the Republican Party must have that same support from the beneficiaries of the high protective tariff as it has always heretofore received from them; and to the further fact that during years of uninterrupted power no action whatever has been taken by the Republican Congress as to correct the admittedly existing tariff iniquities.

We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties.

This bill does that. Then the platform proceeds:

Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list; material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home; and gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the President of the United States is on record, and, so far as I know, no one has successfully refuted his allegation that there is a combination in this country between all the wool interests, both on its manufacturing side and on its producing side, so great that it is able in an American Congress to defeat remedial legislation.

Now, every man here who has had any service in this or any other Congress knows that you have in this bill minimum duties. So far as practical legislation ultimately is concerned, every man knows that if this bill by any manner of chance should get through the other body of Congress, all these duties would go out, and every man knows that in conference, before any wool bill can pass, by reason of the pressure which was mentioned by the President of the United States, the pressure of great interests, the duties in this bill will be increased; the duties will not remain at their minimum, but will go higher. Every man who has helped frame this bill will tell you that now you have a Woolen Trust in the United States.

You have resolutions before your Rules Committee to investigate that trust. You have refused to do it. You are investigating the sugar company and the steel company. Why not investigate the American Woolen Co.? You are placing upon trust-controlled articles a protective duty, not a revenue duty, in obedience to caucus dictation and in violation of your platform pledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to show how utterly ineffective an ungraded ad valorem duty would be in protecting American labor, and I will ask my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], or some other gentleman, to come and help me just a minute while I unfold and show to the House what is known as an Orenberg shawl. There you see is a fabric almost as filmy as a spider's web. It was bought in Moscow at a Government depot for the sale of the products of peasant industries. It cost $32 after the duty had been paid. It weighs 3 ounces. You will see that there are about 8 square yards of it. Peasant labor is paid $27 to $50 a year in Russia. And I am told that it required nearly a year's labor to select the fibers of wool and make the fabric. It was made by Russian peasants. It was bought at cost. There are 3 ounces of wool, which in that form would cost $100 to $150 in the United States. I paid $32 for it—$20 for the shawl itself and 60 per cent duty—and your single ad valorem duty is utterly ineffective both for revenue and for protection as well. You have figured, all the way through your report practically, that the protective feature of the bill was to be found by applying the duty to the American cost; and when your experts have said in your report that 27 per cent of American labor cost would be equalized by making a duty of 13½ per cent on the foreign product you are absolutely mistaken. It would take 40 per cent in the case cited, and it would take at least 400 per cent to do it on the shawl. It shows the fallacy of the straight ad valorem as a protective duty. You have recognized this with reference to flannels; why not on cloths, which are far more important and with a much greater variety of fabrics?

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. I will, if I have time.

Mr. BORLAND. It is a very brief question. Does the gentleman claim that shawl is an article of necessity?

Mr. HILL. Not at all; and all the more reason why you should make your duties graduated, instead of levying a single duty as you propose. [Applause on the Republican side.] I suppose there are only half a dozen of those in this country. I bought it as a curio, not because I could afford it; but the person who buys that as an article of luxury ought to be made to pay a big duty on it, at least 100 or 150 per cent.

Now here is a skein of cotton thread, so fine that you can hardly pick out one single thread. Yet that is made by doubling and twisting two threads, No. 400. You can not make that in the United States under any duty that you have imposed, because American labor is not able to compete. This is No. 200 thread, doubled and twisted, and I think the finest we make is No. 60. You are all wrong in your wool proposition.

Mr. GUDGER. Is the gentleman complaining at the low duty he paid on that shawl?

Mr. HILL. I am.

Mr. GUDGER. Which party levied that duty, the Republican Party or the Democratic Party?

Mr. HILL. I am complaining because for some mysterious reason, unknown to me, you have recognized the principle in your flannel schedule, but have not recognized it in your cloth schedule.

Mr. GUDGER. But your party levied the duty that you complain of. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I ask why you did not recognize the principle in your cloth schedule? If there is any justification for recognizing it in the flannel schedule there is far more justification for recognizing it in the cloth schedule. It simply shows that this bill is the work of amateurs, that is all there is to it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill, the last section of which is as follows:

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; but this section shall not take effect until the 1st day of January, 1912.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 6 by striking out all after the word "repealed," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1912."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill now provides in section 3 a repealing clause, and then says in the same section, "this section shall not take effect until January 1 next." I propose to strike out that language, "this section shall not take effect until January 1 next," and insert a provision that this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the 1st day of January, 1912.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I accept the gentleman's amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the amendment that has just been adopted, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SULZER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool, and had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit with instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PAYNE moves to recommit the bill H. R. 11019 to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to that committee to hold the bill in the committee until the Tariff Board makes report to Congress, not later than the first Monday in December next, of the information secured by the special and complete investigation now being made by said Tariff Board in regard to the production, manufacture, use, and consumption of wool and woolen goods, and especially covering every element of the cost of production, as required by the act of Congress approved March 4, 1911, and to report said bill back to the House with such provisions and amendments as the committee may deem proper after examination and consideration of the information so reported by the Tariff Board, said report by the committee on the bill to be made to the House not later than the 10th day of January, 1912.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion to recommit.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 197, answered "present" 6, not voting 66, as follows:

REPORT OF TARIFF BOARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed. (H. Doc. No. 74):

SCHEDULE K—WOOL.

To the House of Representatives:

On June 7, 1911, your House passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the use of the Members thereof, all the information secured and the tables and statistics prepared by the board of experts, composed of Henry C. Emery, James B. Reynolds, Alvin H. Sanders, William M. Howard, and Thomas W. Page, relating to the various articles and commodities named in Schedule K of the act approved August 5, 1909, being "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," and relating to wool and manufactures thereof.

In response thereto, I beg to submit that I transmitted your resolution to the board of experts named therein, who in reply have prepared a statement under date of June 15, which I inclose.

The board says in this statement:

Statistics compiled by us from the latest available form and domestic sources covering the production, distribution, and consumption of raw wools and woolen manufactures, have already been transmitted, on request, to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and some 20 pages of the recent report of that committee to the House are made up from this compilation and duly credited. The board is conducting an inquiry in relation to raw wools—their production and shrinkage—woolen and worsted manufacturing, and into the manufacturing of certain staple articles made from the products of that industry, which involves original research work that is world-wide in its scope. A large amount of material has already been obtained. This, however, will not be of actual practical value until properly checked and tabulated. Our representatives throughout the United States and in foreign countries are now forwarding data. This incomplete information, necessarily fragmentary in character, if transmitted to Congress would be not only of doubtful utility but actually misleading. In making this statement we are not unmindful of the fact that we are under instructions to complete our work upon this and other important schedules at the earliest possible date. We shall develop the essential facts in relation to both the wool and the cotton schedules in time for forwarding to Congress next December, and in this endeavor we are not only working to the limit of the present appropriation but to the utmost capacity of our entire force. In order that the magnitude of the task may be understood, we respectfully present herewith an outline of our procedure.

This language and an examination of the detailed account of what the board is doing contained therein will show that they have no further information than that which has already been transmitted to the Committee on Ways and Means in any form or condition proper for transmission.

The board of experts was first engaged in assisting the Executive in the discharge of his duties under the maximum and minimum clause of the Payne tariff bill. Its attention was then directed to accumulating information for use in connection with the reciprocity agreement made with Canada, and especially the comparative cost of commodities in Canada and in the United States, the price of labor, and particularly farm labor in the two countries, and the cost of producing paper and wood pulp on both sides of the boundary.

The sundry civil appropriation act of last year provided that if a tariff commission or board was established it should report on the wool schedule by the 1st of December. The Tariff Commission bill was lost, but under the discretionary power vested in me I appointed a board as near like the one described in the bill which was lost as possible, a nonpartisan board of five members, and I directed them to make the examination into Schedule K, its meaning, and the cost of production of wool and of woolens in this country and abroad, and to have their report ready by the 1st of December, in accordance with the direction of the appropriation bill to the tariff commission, a direction which passed both Houses of the last Congress.

The board of experts reports to me, as will be seen by this inclosed statement, that they will have a full and complete report on the subject of Schedule K and its contents, the cost of production of wool and woolens at home and abroad, and also upon the same facts in respect to the cotton schedule, by the 1st of December next, when I shall be glad to submit both to the Congress.

Meantime, the board is not in a position to transmit anything except what has already been sent to the Ways and Means Committee.

In order that Congress may more fully understand what the board of experts is engaged in, I transmit, in connection with their statement, a report by a committee of the National Tariff Commission Association, which applied to me for permission to investigate the methods of procedure of the board of experts and the scope and progress of the work.

Their judgment is shown in the following paragraph:

In conclusion, our committee finds that the Tariff Board is composed of able, impartial, and earnest men, who are devoting their energies unreservedly to the work before them; that the staff has been carefully selected for the work in view, is efficiently organized and directed, and includes a number of exceptionally competent technical experts; that the scale of salaries is reasonable—indeed, very moderate—and that all other expenditures are closely scrutinized and appear to be equally reasonable; that the work of the board, vast and intricate in detail, is already highly organized, well systematized, and running smoothly; and that Congress and the people can now await the completion of that work with entire confidence that it is progressing as rapidly as consistent with proper thoroughness, and that it will amply justify all of the time and expense which it entails. We believe that the value of the work when completed will be so great and so evident as to leave remaining no single doubt as to the expediency of maintaining it as a permanent function of the Government for the benefit of all the people.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 20, 1911. WM. H. TAFT.

THE TARIFF BOARD, TREASURY BUILDING,
Washington, June 15, 1911.

The PRESIDENT:

In acknowledging receipt of a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives calling for all the information in the possession of the Tariff Board relating to Schedule K, we beg to submit the following statement:

Statistics compiled by us from the latest available foreign and domestic sources, covering the production, distribution, and consumption of raw wools and woolen manufactures, have already been transmitted on request to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and some 20 pages of the recent report of that committee to the House are made up from this compilation and duly credited. The board is conducting an inquiry in relation to raw wools—their production and shrinkage—woolen and worsted manufacturing, and into the manufacturing of certain staple articles made from the products of that industry, which involves original research work that is world-wide in its scope.

A large amount of material has already been obtained. This, however, will not be of actual practical value until properly checked and tabulated. Our representatives throughout the United States and in foreign countries are now forwarding data. This incomplete information, necessarily fragmentary in character, if transmitted to Congress would be not only of doubtful utility but actually misleading. In making this statement we are not unmindful of the fact that we are under instructions to complete our work upon this and other important schedules at the earliest possible date. We shall develop the essential facts in relation to both the wool and the cotton schedules in time for forwarding to Congress next December; and in this endeavor we are not only working to the limit of the present appropriation, but to the utmost capacity of our entire force. In order that the magnitude of the task may be understood, we respectfully present herewith an outline of our procedure.

The rates provided by Schedule K in its present form are based largely upon the duty on raw wool. The logical starting point, therefor, for any comprehensive study of the facts underlying the schedule is the sheep husbandry of the United States, South America, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and various parts of Europe. The board began, more than a year ago, the consideration of plans designed to cover this wide field of investigation. An original inquiry as to all the conditions surrounding the industry in the great woolgrowing regions of the United States was imperative. It was found at the very inception of the work that the inquiry presented many problems difficult of solution, especially in the matter of determining wool-production costs. Few attempts at ascertaining the exact cost of maintaining sheep under different conditions have ever been made, so far as we have been able to discover, either by individuals, experiment stations, or agricultural departments in this or any other country. Time was necessarily consumed in an effort to formulate the inquiries in such a way as to bring out the data desired.

The first inquiry schedule adopted was printed last November and placed in the hands of representatives chosen for their special knowledge of sheep management, farm and ranch wages, and forage values. They were instructed to visit personally representative flock owners throughout the leading wool-producing sections and obtain first-hand information, to be made the basis of the necessary computations and tabulations.

Woolgrowing in the United States centers largely in the trans-Missouri country, probably two-thirds of the domestic clip coming from the far West. Throughout the Middle Western States wool is for the most part produced as an incident to lamb feeding and mutton making; but in Ohio and the contiguous territory of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Michigan there is an established industry having as its chief objective the production of wool of the finer grades. It was believed that production costs for that region could be worked out with reasonable exactness, because in a large proportion of instances the entire farm and its products are devoted chiefly to the maintenance of the flock. The figures in such case are not complicated by expense items chargeable to other production. Typical counties in this territory were covered by our representatives.

Some 500 different farms were visited, and the returns thus obtained are being carefully checked and tabulated, the cost of maintenance determined, the weight and selling price of the clip ascertained, the cost in each case computed, and samples of the wool submitted to an expert to determine its market grade and its probable shrinkage. One of these agents also studied the situation in the Province of Ontario. Meantime the board's representatives were sent into the Southwest with new schedules specially adapted to conditions prevailing in that part of the country. They have already covered Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California, Utah, Colorado, Oregon, and Washington, and are now entering Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming. They are under instructions to push the work with all possible dispatch consistent with accuracy. It has been found desirable to utilize, as far as possible, the same agents throughout the entire territory to be covered. These representatives are now nearing the end of their study of woolgrowing in the western part of the United States. Considerable time, however, will necessarily be required in checking carefully the mass of figures being accumulated. Not until this is completed will it be possible for the board to analyze and interpret the information, statistical and otherwise, being received from so many different sources.

Concurrently with this work, foreign fields have also been under investigation by special agents of the board. One of these agents proceeded to Australia last October, has recently returned, and is now perfecting his report in London, England, a great distributing point for the Australian wools. A similar report from New Zealand, representing the work of a special agent in that country, is nearing completion. In February a special agent of the board was sent to South America, proceeding direct to Punta Arenas. He is now nearing the end of an investigation, attended by many difficulties, throughout the vast domain extending from the Straits of Magellan to Montevideo. His report will include valuable facts and figures from remote woolgrowing regions seldom, if ever before, visited by students of this question. He is also under instructions to report upon wheat production in Argentina, as well as upon the meat-export possibilities of that country. The latter subject is of especial interest at this time in view of pending proposals to open our ports for the free entry of meat products. This agent is expected back about August 1. It should be stated that a large proportion of all these reports are accompanied by samples of the wool produced, together with selling prices and estimated shrinkages.

The board is making careful inquiry into the whole question of shrinkages in both domestic and foreign markets. A member of the board has been in recent attendance upon the colonial auction sales of wool in London and will also visit continental ports where foreign wools are handled. Experts are under instructions to obtain the fullest possible data as to the ratio of scoured to grease wool in various clips, as determined by the experience of leading makers of "tops" and yarns at home and abroad. Agents of the board are also obtaining information concerning wool wastes and shoddy in their relation to the spinning and weaving processes.

The matter of rail and ocean freights on raw wools is of importance and is receiving our attention.

The work of the board in connection with woolen and worsted manufactures deals with four elements of this question: First, cloth of domestic manufacture; second, cloth of foreign manufacture imported into the United States; third, cloth of foreign manufacture not coming into the United States; fourth, efficiency of labor and of mill equipment.

The inquiry into this first section is an investigation of the cost of production here of staple cloths of American manufacture and the production cost of similar cloths made abroad. This embraces the complete range of woolen and worsted fabrics in general use at the present time in the United States. The great variety of fabrics manufactured by various mills makes it necessary that only those cloths shall be taken for inquiry which are staple and are representative of the industry in its different branches.

A careful study was made of this question and a large number of specimen cloths were secured by the board to cover this entire range, equally divided between the men's wear and women's dress goods, and ranging in grade and price from the lowest to the highest. The board is securing the actual cost of production of these cloths from the mill where each fabric was made, this being taken directly from the books of the manufacturer.

An extensive part of this work is the collection of verified estimates of cost of these goods in different mills of the United States. All of the specimen cloths have been analyzed, and samples are being taken to manufacturers, with a descriptive card attached, giving the width, weight, number of picks, number of ends, the different yarns that go to make up the fabric, and their size and quality. The purpose of the board in this part of the inquiry is to ascertain the cost of making these cloths, not only in different parts of the country, but in mills which vary in size, equipment, and output. Agents of the board take these samples to different manufacturers, and with their representative figure out the cost of production of such goods in their mills. This accounting is done upon schedules which go into every detail of manufacture, from the original stock to the finished cloth. It takes up each process separately, from the sorting and blending of the wool to the finishing of the cloth. In every process it goes into the elements of productive labor, nonproductive labor, and department expense, and it secures every item and detail entering into the making of the fabric.

By these schedules is also obtained the yearly general expense of each mill, together with every detail of works expense and fixed charges, and all such items as taxes and depreciation. All of this cost accounting is based upon identical fabrics, bearing identical analyses, and is being secured from mills that make identical or similar fabrics. Samples of these same cloths have been sent abroad, and similar production costs are being secured there by our agents under the personal supervision of a member of the board.

Cloths of foreign manufacture are being treated in a similar way, and information secured as to what would be the cost of such fabrics if manufactured in the United States. Typical cloths have been secured by personal visits of a member of the board to foreign manufacturers, and these are being used as the basis of this part of the inquiry. A special feature of the investigation is the question of what, if any, cloths are now excluded from the United States. From foreign manufacturers have been obtained sample cloths, which they assert they can not export to this country because of prohibitive tariff rates. The board is conducting a careful inquiry as to whether or not such goods do come here, and also as to the price of similar goods made in the United States. This latter question will be gone into thoroughly, to ascertain the effect upon the American consumer of any nonimportation of such cloths.

The fourth element is the entire question of labor, hours of labor, and efficiency of labor, and equipment. Agents of the board are now at work along this line in this country and in England, Germany, and France. They are using the same schedules in all four countries in order that the whole matter of efficiency may be properly determined and the results obtained be comparable.

These schedules provide for the securing of all details of mill manufacture in this industry. They call for particulars in regard to the persons employed in each and every occupation in worsted and woolen manufacture, the machine equipment, its nature, age, and efficiency, the amount of work done by each employee, together with hours of work, amount earned, and output produced.

The board is also engaged in conducting an investigation into the production cost of articles made from woolen and worsted cloth to ascertain the details and cost of the manufacture of garments for men and women. An inquiry is also being planned into the production cost of woolen blankets, and this will embrace such manufacture in the different sections of the country.

In addition to this, a complete glossary of Schedules I and K will be ready for submission in December. This will include all the latest statistical information available, definitions of terms used, ad valorem equivalents of existing duties, brief presentation of the commercial geography of the industries involved, and concise descriptions of manufacturing processes. It will be accompanied by graphic charts and the completed results of the board's own research work, covering both the cotton and the woolen schedules.

Respectfully submitted.

THE NATIONAL TARIFF COMMISSION ASSOCIATION,
New York, June 14, 1911.

Mr. JOHN CANDLER CORB,
President the National Tariff Commission Association.

DEAR SIR: Under the permission given at your request by President Taft, in his letter to you of May 4, 1911, the committee of our association selected to investigate and report on the organization, methods, and work of the Tariff Board submits the subjoined report.

The President's action was predicated on the concurrence of the Tariff Board, whose chairman, in a letter to the President dated May 2, 1911, wrote:

"I beg to say that the Tariff Board are unanimous in welcoming this proposal, and that we shall be very glad indeed to have a committee of the National Tariff Commission Association make a thorough examination of our work and to offer them every facility for doing so."

Five members of our committee went to Washington in order personally to investigate the organization and work of the Tariff Board, with which most of them were previously more or less familiar, and devoted much additional time to reviewing the information thus obtained and in reaching conclusions thereon. We undertook the investigation with open minds, without previous commitment or prejudice, either for or against the Tariff Board and its methods. Our effort throughout was to ascertain facts. The conclusions reached represent the unanimous judgment of the committee.

Our investigation was so thorough and the information gathered so voluminous that our record of the results is necessarily somewhat extensive. To facilitate its use we have divided it into two parts, namely, the report, which summarizes the essential facts and states our conclusions thereon, and a supplement, which contains a historical review of the Tariff Board and gives the detailed information on which our conclusions are based. Those who desire a full understanding of the matter should read both papers.

The committee desires to record its appreciation of the cordial cooperation and assistance given to it throughout by each and all of the members of the Tariff Board. Unlimited opportunity was afforded us in our investigations of the work and methods of the board, the organization of the staff, the rates of salaries paid, and the kind and amount of all other expenses incurred. Every inquiry by us was responded to unreservedly and satisfactorily. We are justified, therefore, in stating that our conclusions are based upon a full and intelligent understanding of the facts.

Respectfully,

HENRY R. TOWNE, Chairman,
President Merchants' Association of New York.
JOHN KIRBY, Jr.,
President National Association of Manufacturers.
CHARLES M. JARVIS,
Vice President National Association of Manufacturers.
H. E. MILES,
Ex-President National Association of Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers.
J. J. CULBERTSON,
President Southern Cotton Seed Crushers' Association.
FRANCIS T. SIMMONS,
Member Executive Council, Chicago Association of Commerce.

THE NATIONAL TARIFF COMMISSION ASSOCIATION REPORT.

1. Organization of the Tariff Board: The Tariff Board was created in September, 1909, and under the instructions of President Taft devoted itself exclusively to work relating to the application of the maximum and minimum tariff rates in our treaties with foreign countries until April 1, 1910. For reasons explained in the supplement the board was not organized for its permanent work until October 1, 1910. All that has been accomplished in investigations, statistical work, and reports has been done since the latter date.

Our committee was favorably impressed with the character, ability, and fitness of the members of the Tariff Board appointed by President Taft. We think it fortunate that the country has been able to secure for service in this new and untried field five men who, on the whole, are so well equipped for their duties, so impartial and able in so short a time to organize the work on an effective basis. In this connection it is important to keep in mind the fact that the functions of the Tariff Board are administrative and judicial; that its members were not selected as technical experts in any one field of industry; that the work of technical investigation will be done by many experts employed for this purpose by the board; and that the highest function of the board will consist in weighing the evidence thus gathered, in reaching sound conclusions thereon, and in embodying all essential facts in its reports. In this respect the board acts as a court of first instance to review the evidence gathered by its experts and to pass judgment thereon. It thus fulfills the functions of a commission appointed by a court of justice to make findings of fact for the information of the court. Briefly, the motto of the board might be "to furnish facts, not opinions." Congress is and will remain the court of final judgment, which will receive the findings of the Tariff Board and take such action thereon, if any, as in the judgment of Congress may appear to be necessary or expedient.

The view has been expressed that each member of the board should be an expert in some one field, the investigation of which would be referred to him, and that the board should consist of 15, 20, or even 30 members; but reflection will show that under this plan there would be no unity or cooperation in the work, that in effect the report on each subject would be by a subcommittee, and that the final result would be a series of unrelated and possibly discrepant conclusions and reports. The plan actually adopted wisely avoids this danger by making the whole board a reviewing body to pass judgment upon the voluminous facts gathered and submitted by the experts employed for this part of the work, all five members of the board thus participating in every conclusion reached and judgment rendered. Thus far the final decisions of the board have in every case been unanimous.

2. The staff: For the technical investigation which the work involves the board utilizes the services of trained experts, carefully selected with reference to their ability and past experience in each line of investigation taken up, and the experience thus far indicates that men possessing the requisite experience, skill, and knowledge can be secured on fair terms. Members of our committee passed in review every important employee of the board (except those absent on field work), investigated their duties, ascertained the salaries paid, and thus informed themselves generally concerning the business organization and methods thus far developed. The resulting impression was unexpectedly satisfactory and fully justifies the statement that the administration of the work of the Tariff Board is on a sound, economical, and businesslike basis, which does credit to the members of the board and demonstrates conclusively their fitness to perform the executive function which their duties involve. Their equal fitness to perform intelligently and impartially the judicial function, which constitutes the other and greater part of their duty, may be judged from the two reports which they have thus far rendered and which are referred to in detail in the supplement.

The development of the staff is shown in detail in the supplement, but is summarized in the following table, which shows the total number of employees of all kinds on the several dates mentioned, viz:

Apr. 1, 1910, at completion of work on maximum and minimum schedules	12
Oct. 1, 1910, permanent work fairly organized	25
Jan. 15, 1911	70
May 15, 1911	80

The present staff is as large as justified by the present annual appropriation, a considerable part of which is absorbed by other expenses incident to the work. The present organization appears to be large enough for efficiency and good economy, but if more rapid progress is desired it would seem feasible for the board to accomplish it, in case Congress should see fit, for this purpose, temporarily to increase the appropriation.

3. Scope and progress of work: Our committee, although previously familiar with the subject, was deeply impressed by the immense complexity and scope of the work which the Tariff Board has undertaken, and also by the progress already made in creating an organization for its effective conduct, and by the volume of work accomplished in the past eight months, or since October 1, 1910, when the board was first effectively organized. The actual achievement during this short period justifies the prediction that the work on other important schedules can be completed in similar periods or less, and on the simpler schedules in proportionately shorter time. If Congress should deem it desirable that work on all of the schedules should be conducted coincidently, and should make the additional appropriation thus implied, the Tariff Board undoubtedly could arrange accordingly and thus accelerate the completion of work on all the schedules. When the initial work thus implied has once been completed, the continuing work of keeping it revised and corrected to date will be relatively easy and simple.

The situation at this date may be summarized as follows, viz:

The tariff includes 14 schedules, lettered from A to N, inclusive.

"Glossary work" has been started as to 12 of these schedules, is well advanced, and probably will be nearly completed by the close of this year.

"Field work" has been started as to 4 schedules, on which it is planned to consolidate until these are completed, whereupon work on others will be begun. The schedules referred to are K (wool and woolens), A (chemicals), N (paper and pulp), and I (cotton manufactures).

With the present appropriation of $250,000 per annum, it seems probable that all of the work of original research, covering all of the 14 tariff schedules, will be completed within three years or a little more—say, by December 1, 1914. When the original work has thus been completed, the labor and cost of keeping it closely corrected to date will be relatively small.

4. Coercive powers: The Tariff Board at present has no power to compel the giving of testimony, and thus far has found no need for such authority. The manufacturers who have been approached thus far have given the board, voluntarily, free access to their books and records and cordial cooperation in ascertaining and verifying all facts pertinent to the inquiry in hand. Tenders of similar cooperation from producers in other lines are being received, with every indication that the experience above referred to will be repeated with each new industry as it is taken up. These facts are a credit to American manufacturers and justify the belief that they do not shun investigations of this kind, that they ask no unfair favors, and that they desire that future tariff schedules shall be framed with knowledge of all the facts and with fair regard for the interests of all the people. All interested in or affected by the tariff should welcome the creation of an impartial and competent tribunal for this purpose.

While the board thus far has found no need for coercive power in the procurement of evidence, we regard it as desirable that the board should have conferred upon it the qualified power in this respect contemplated in the bill making permanent the organization of the board, which was favorably considered by each House of the last Congress.

5. Reports: The board has already filed two reports (1) on "Canadian reciprocity," and (2) on "Pulp and news-print paper." It proposes in each future report to cover one, or possibly several, schedules, until all of these have been completed. Obviously it can not and should not report concerning any schedule until its investigations relating thereto have substantially been completed, for until then the members of the board are not in position to pass in review the completed work of the experts, and to make final report thereon. To ask the board to report before the completion of the investigations on which its report must be based would be equivalent to asking a court of justice to render a verdict upon a case before it after hearing only a fraction of the available and essential evidence.

Our committee is satisfied that the board is working with great diligence and with as great rapidity as thus far has been consistent with thoroughness and sound results, but, under a larger appropriation, as pointed out elsewhere, the work could now be considerably accelerated if Congress so desires. In this connection the chairman of the board has recently made the following statement, with which we concur, viz:

"It would be inconsistent to expect of any such body that it should adopt the new standard of thoroughness demanded of it and yet be prepared to make a complete and carefully matured report on any subject at a moment's notice. Such investigations are arduous and involve the collection of a vast amount of data from many parts of the world, and when these data are received they require careful tabulation and analysis before they can be scheduled properly for a report.

"On the other hand, a tariff board should confine itself within the field of the practical and realize that with due diligence promptness may be combined with accuracy. Furthermore, as such work progresses it may be pushed with increasing rapidity as the machinery of investigation which had to be created anew for the first inquiries is available and in improved working order for each new task."

Commenting on one of the issued reports an official of the Royal Imperial Ministry of Commerce of Austria, regarded in Europe as a leading authority on tariff questions, says:

"The report is excellent and in line with the latest theory, and I know of no European publication which so correctly interprets the most improtant features of the question of commercial policy as does your report on the paper industry. This is a very good beginning, and I already see that you will soon leave all the European government departments far behind in the publication of model reports on questions of commercial policy. This report will attract great attention in Europe."

Referring to the same report the president of the American Paper & Pulp Association, which, through its officers, gave willing and valuable aid to the board, has asked for 800 copies of the report, and says: "I consider it a most valuable book, which should be in the possession of every manufacturer."

The observations of our committee confirm and justify these favorable comments. We believe that the reports of the Tariff Board, as they are issued, will prove to be of great value not only to Congress and the executive departments of the Government, but also to American producers in all fields of industry, collectively and individually. We predict that this opinion will be indorsed by the latter as rapidly as they have opportunity to receive and study the reports relating to their respective lines of industry.

At present the Tariff Board exists only by Executive order, and therefore its reports are addressed to the President through the Secretary of the Treasury. It is earnestly to be hoped that at an early date Congress will enact a law making the Tariff Board a permanent part of the machinery of the Federal Government, and in so doing Congress presumably will make provision whereby the board shall, on request, report directly to Congress, or to either House thereof, concerning any matter within its field of investigation and concerning which its work has been completed or is sufficiently advanced to enable it to respond to such a call.

6. Expenditures and appropriations: Congress appropriated $75,000 for the use of the President in securing information in the manner authorized in article 718, section 2, of the Payne-Aldrich bill, of which over $25,000 was unexpended on June 30, 1910. The net expenditure of the Tariff Board up to the latter date was thus under $50,000.

Congress next appropriated the sum of $250,000 for the expenses of the Tariff Board during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1910. It is estimated that about $50,000 of this will be unexpended on June 30, 1911. The net expenditure for the fiscal year will thus be within $200,000.

The total expenditures from the beginning to July 1, 1911, will thus be within $250,000.

As the work of the board is now organized (June, 1911), the expenditure involved is at a rate about equivalent to the present appropriation. As a similar appropriation exists for the next fiscal year, it will thus suffice for the continuance of the work at the present rate.

In conclusion, our committee finds that the Tariff Board is composed of able, impartial, and earnest men who are devoting their energies unreservedly to the work before them; that the staff has been carefully selected for the work in view, is efficiently organized and directed, and includes a number of exceptionally competent technical experts; that the scale of salaries is reasonable, indeed very moderate, and that all other expenditures are closely scrutinized and appear to be equally reasonable; that the work of the board, vast and intricate in detail, is already highly organized, well systematized, and running smoothly; and that Congress and the people can now await the completion of that work with entire confidence that it is progressing as rapidly as consistent with proper thoroughness, and that it will amply justify all of the time and expense which it entails. We believe that the value of the work when completed will be so great and so evident as to leave remaining no single doubt as to the expediency of maintaining it as a permanent function of the Government for the benefit of all the people.

SUPPLEMENT.

The tariff act of August 5, 1909, commonly known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, contains in article 718, section 2, the following provision:

"To secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section—that is, relating to the application of the maximum and minimum rates—and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required."

Under the authority thus given, the President, by a letter dated September 14, 1909, appointed three persons to assist him in the manner contemplated by the act, and designated them as constituting the Tariff Board. The persons so appointed were: Prof. Henry C. Emery (chairman), professor of political economy in Yale University; Alvin H. Sanders, editor of the Breeders' Gazette (a leading agricultural journal), and for 30 years a student and writer on agricultural subjects; James B. Reynolds, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and for some four years previous in charge of customs.

The members of the board met for the first time September 24, 1909, and at this meeting issued a letter to importers concerning the application of the maximum and minimum provisions of the new tariff law. About October 15 the board received instructions from the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed to investigate and report concerning the application of article 718, section 2, of the tariff act to our treaties with foreign nations, and to assist the Department of State in conducting the negotiations relating thereto, the instructions stating that, when this work was completed, the Tariff Board should then apply itself to ascertaining the costs of production, at home and abroad, of all articles covered by the tariff schedules.

The work relating to the application of the "maximum and minimum" provisions of the tariff act involved an exhaustive investigation of all commercial treaties with all nations, and the provisions of the act required that this work must be completed by April 1, 1910. The work thus involved occupied the Tariff Board exclusively until that date, by which time it had successfully been completed. It involved the analysis of the tariffs of every other country, most of them expressed in foreign languages, measures, and values. The negotiations conducted by the State Department, with the assistance of the Tariff Board as to technical matters, were of vast importance to the commerce and industry of the country. They removed all undue discriminations against the United States without resort to reprisals by the application of the maximum tariff rates, and resulted in many tariff concessions from other countries which we had never before enjoyed. The benefits thus secured were vast and lasting, thus saving the country from tariff wars, and they were well worth all they cost in time and money. And yet some persons, not appreciating these facts, and ignoring the order of the President that the Tariff Board should devote itself exclusively to this work and complete it before beginning its investigation of "costs," criticized and condemned the board because it had not, forthwith upon its creation, applied itself to the latter work. On April 1, 1910, when the board had thus completed the work first assigned to it, its employees were 12 in number.

For the work assigned to the Tariff Board, Congress appropriated the sum of $75,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, of which on the latter date $25,795.80 was turned back into the Treasury unexpended.

Upon the completion of its initial work, April 1, 1910, the Tariff Board was unable to formulate its further plans by reason of the fact that no appropriation existed for the continuance of its work after June 30, 1910. By an act passed June 25, 1910, Congress appropriated the sum of $250,000 for the expenses of the Tariff Board during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1910. Anticipating the chronological sequence of events, it may be stated here that the unexpended balance of this appropriation on May 1, 1911, was $112,004.28 (excluding the April pay roll, due but not paid), and that it is now estimated that the total expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, will not exceed $200,000, thus leaving $50,000 of the appropriation unexpended. As the work is now organized, however, the full amount of the present appropriation is needed and is being effectively used.

On May 11, 1910, Prof. Emery went to Europe to lay the foundations for the future work of investigation there and to study European methods of conducting tariff investigations. He spent most of his time in Germany and Austria, with brief visits to London and Paris. He returned July 16.

On June 14 Mr. Reynolds went to Europe in order to utilize his previously acquired experience and acquaintance with the special agents of the Treasury Department and to secure the benefit of their experience and knowledge in matters pertaining to foreign costs of production; also to arrange for securing a full line of samples of certain European products needed in the textile investigation. His trip covered numerous places in France, Italy, Switzerland, and Great Britain. He returned October 1.

During the summer of 1910 Mr. Sanders remained in Washington and devoted his time to finding men qualified to serve on the staff of the Tariff Board. Their selection demanded great care and much investigation. The work proposed was new, serious, wide in scope, highly technical, and its ultimate success depended upon the ability of the board to secure men of the right abilities and experience. That they have been successful in doing so is demonstrated by the facts set forth in the report.

The first definite appointment of a technical expert was made in July, 1910, the position involving charge of the foundation work relating to Schedule K (wool and woolens), which thus was the first schedule to receive attention. In August another appointment was made of a special agent who was sent to Australia to study and report on the wool industry of that country.

On September 6, 1910, Chairman Emery submitted a report to the Secretary of the Treasury giving the results of his European trip and of his investigation of European methods. During this month the "glossary" work was started and the field force organized by the appointment of some 8 or 10 picked men.

The "glossary" work above referred to had its origin in the instructions given by the President to the board, that, in connection with its other work, the board should "translate the tariff into plain English" by showing the ad valorem equivalent of every rate embraced in the tariff schedules, whether such rate, as fixed by the law, is specific, ad valorem, or compound. In carrying out this plan the board has found it expedient to incorporate with it a large amount of additional statistical data necessary for its work and of great public interest. As a result, the "glossary" when completed will show, as to each important article of product enumerated in the tariff law, the following facts, viz: Kind of material; history and development of the industry; geographical distribution of the industry; technical description of product; technical description of processes employed, domestic and foreign; uses for consumption or for further manufacture; statistics of production, domestic and foreign; existing duty and ad valorem equivalent; previous duties and ad valorem equivalents.

The greater part of this work of compilation is already done, and it is expected that the "glossary" will substantially be completed by January, 1912, and thereafter will be published in sections, each covering the facts relating to one or several tariff schedules, and issued coincidentally with the report of the board on such schedules. Most of the statistical material needed was already in existence, although it had never before been combined and utilized in the manner now proposed.

The "glossary" when completed will be a mine of information for Congress and the people on all statistical subjects relating to the tariff, and will be invaluable in all future work of tariff revision. While its original preparation has entailed a vast amount of work, its value will amply justify the moderate cost. The work of keeping the "glossary" complete and corrected to date in the future will be comparatively light and inexpensive.

On October 1, 1910, the Tariff Board was fairly organized, all three of its members were again at home, it had 25 employees selected and engaged, and its "field work" was planned and started. This date marks the real commencement of the work of the board in investigating and determining "costs of production at home and abroad." Practically all that the board has accomplished in this its permanent field of operations has been accomplished since October 1, 1910.

The term "field work" used above relates to the work of experts employed by the board in visiting industrial plants, at home and abroad, to investigate their products and processes, and, by personal inspection of their books and records, to obtain, at first hand, all information essential to determining, on a uniform basis for each industry, previously planned by the board, the actual cost of production for each product investigated.

On January 1, 1911, the staff of the Tariff Board was well organized and its work in full swing, the number of names on the pay roll being 70. The Senate, by a resolution adopted February 23, called on the board for an immediate report on the then pending Canadian reciprocity bill, and on farm products. By calling in men from field work, and by working nights and a Sunday, this report was completed in five days, and was handed in on February 28. It covers 132 printed pages and is fully responsive to the resolution.

During the short session of the Sixty-first Congress, ending March 4, 1911, several bills were introduced intended to make the Tariff Board permanent, increasing its number to five, and more clearly defining its powers. A bill to this effect was adopted by each House of Congress, in slightly different forms, but failed of final enactment during the last hour. It is greatly to be hoped that a bill of this kind may be passed by the present Congress at the earliest practicable date, thus guaranteeing the permanence of the Tariff Board and its work, and removing both from the field of partisan politics.

On March 4, 1911, President Taft appointed two additional members of the Tariff Board, thus raising its membership to five, and in doing so selected Democrats, the three previous appointees being Republicans, thus giving practical effect to two of the provisions of the bill above referred to. The two new appointees were Prof. Thomas W. Page, professor of economics in the University of Virginia, and previously dean of the College of Commerce, University of California; and Hon. William M. Howard, for 14 years a Member of the House of Representatives from Georgia, and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee in the Sixty-first Congress.

On May 15, seven and one-half months after its effective organization, the board handed in its first completed report on a tariff schedule. This is a report of 134 printed pages on "The Pulp and News-Print Paper Industry," and can properly be regarded as a specimen of the work which the board can accomplish. As such it should be noted carefully by all American manufacturers. It will be referred to in detail later. On this date the number of names on the pay roll of the board was 78, including 31 men engaged in "field work," 4 of the latter being in Europe and the remainder in domestic plants.

The tariff embraces 14 schedules, designated by letters A to N. The first selected for investigation was Schedule K, wool and woolens. The work on this will be finished as to raw wool for all countries during July, and it is expected to have the remaining work, relating to woolen manufactures, completed, including the "glossary," so that the entire report will be finished and available by December, 1911. The work is very broad in its scope, has disclosed numerous discrepancies and errors in previously accepted authorities, and will have great permanent value. Work was next started on Schedules M (paper and pulp), A (chemicals), and I (cotton manufactures). The work on the first of these is now about 80 per cent completed, on the second about 40 per cent, and on the third about 33 per cent. Work has not yet been commenced on any of the other schedules, except that the "glossary work," as above stated, for all schedules is well advanced toward completion.

By the same date the board expects to submit its report on Schedule I (cotton manufactures) complete with "glossary," and the "glossary" relating to Schedule A (chemicals), which will be of exceptional importance because of the relations of this schedule to many others. The whole field force of 31 experts is now engaged on the textile schedules, K and I, in the domestic and foreign markets, and the work of the board is being conducted on as large a scale as is justified by the present appropriation.

The Tariff Board hopes to utilize, in connection with Schedule C (iron and steel) and Schedule D (lumber), much of the data heretofore accumulated by the Bureau of Corporations of the Department of Commerce and Labor. It is greatly to be desired that the work of the two bureaus, where it overlaps, should be so coordinated as to avoid needless duplication and to advance the purposes of both.

Work on the subjects covered by report No. 1, on the pulp and paper industry, above referred to, began October, 1910, and the report was forwarded to the President May 15, 1911. In the "field work" from five to eight experts were employed during an average of about three months. In the office work two persons were employed about one month in the preparation of the necessary forms, two persons about one week in visiting plants to verify the correctness of these forms, and 12 persons about two months in digesting and tabulating the data obtained by the field force. In this industry every domestic manufacturer who was called on responded unreservedly to the requests of the board except one small manufacturer, who, however, consented later. This was done, not by furnishing ex parte statements (as in congressional investigations heretofore undertaken), but by opening their books to the field representatives of the Tariff Board and by permitting the latter to obtain all desired information and to verify its correctness by all necessary checks. All of this was accomplished by the voluntary cooperation of the manufacturers and without the possession by the board of any coercive powers. This experience was repeated in Canada, where, after some reluctance at first, the manufacturers cooperated with equal willingness and unreserve. The data thus obtained relating to the pulp and paper industry covered 80 per cent of the domestic production and 78 per cent of the Canadian production.

As illustrative of the value and possibilities of the work of the Tariff Board this report (of 134 pages) may be compared with the special report of the Sixtieth Congress, second session, House Document No. 1502, relating to the same subject, which is embraced in five volumes, containing 3,366 pages, and an index volume of 284 pages, the investigation having commenced in April, 1908, and closed in March, 1909. The essence of this report of the Tariff Board is contained in Tables 4 and 5, on page 28, and in Table 17, on page 52. The facts contained in these tables afford a sounder basis for intelligent action by Congress than has ever heretofore been available, although the report is replete from beginning to end with useful and enlightening data. One of the significant facts brought out is the wide discrepancy in plant efficiency, due partly to size and location, but chiefly to quality of equipment. The evidence thus developed should have a wholesome influence in stimulating all owners of plants of low efficiency to secure the obvious benefits to be obtained by conforming them to the best modern practice.

It is already apparent that the cooperation of manufacturers, given so unreservedly in the paper and pulp investigation, can confidently be looked for in other industries. It has definitely been tendered by leading interests identified with the cotton, woolen, steel, and chemical industries. The reluctance of manufacturers to cooperate, which at first was anticipated, if it ever existed, is yielding to the influence of experience and good judgment, and bids fair ultimately to disappear. The producer who believes that he needs and should have protection should be willing to furnish facts in support of this plea, and the experience thus far tends to show that a majority, if not all, of those interested in the tariff are ready to assist the Tariff Board in ascertaining impartially, accurately, and completely all of the essential facts in each industry involved. With this cooperation assured, we are convinced as to the ability of the board to accomplish the important work for which it has been created.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Why was not the message read before the vote was taken on the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. The message came in while the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and did not give any information on the subject under consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it had been sent in before the President left town, it would have been in time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the indulgence of the House for one minute. I will not ask a longer time than that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a second. I think, in justice to the Speaker, I should say that the message just read came to the House while the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the committee rising informally for the purpose of receiving the message. The gentleman at the Speaker's desk, the parliamentary clerk, submitted the message to myself, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and a few other gentlemen of the House, and asked whether we desired to have the committee rise and go back into the House for the purpose of having it read. As the message stated that it had no information to convey to the House from the Tariff Board other than that which had already been sent to the Ways and Means Committee, I said that I thought at that stage it was not necessary for the committee to rise in order to have the message read, and which, of course, would have been a very unusual proceeding. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thanks the gentleman from Illinois for making that graceful statement.

DIRECT ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, just a minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose, after a conference with gentlemen on the other side a few days ago, to wait until the passage of the bill just voted upon and then move to take from the Speaker's table, or ask the Speaker to lay before the House, the resolution relating to the election of Senators by popular vote. I understood that by agreement on both sides this course would be pursued immediately following the passage of the bill which has just been voted on. Relying upon that, and believing that that was the understanding, I told numerous gentlemen so. Now, in order to be fair with myself and to gentlemen on the other side, I want to say we expected to go at it at a time when we had daylight in which to transact the business. There seems to be a desire for debate. The indications are that as much as an hour and a half on a side may be wanted. That much debate now would prolong the session until a late hour, and I find that a large majority of the membership of the House protest against such a prolonged session. I have made this statement in order to put myself right with gentlemen whom I have promised I would ask for immediate action on the bill. A few minutes ago, in conference with gentlemen representing the other side of the Chamber, we agreed that, with the approval of the House, the matter be passed until to-morrow, and then be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal, and then proceed to consider it and conclude it. The impression now prevails that we will get through in time for all gentlemen who desire to do so to leave the Capitol building by 5 o'clock, or probably a little earlier; but until then I earnestly hope that all gentlemen interested in this question, especially all Democrats, as well as those on the other side of the aisle, will remain here to-morrow and determine the course we will take with reference to the amendment which came to us from the Senate.

Now, I thank the House, Mr. Speaker. for its courtesy. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, June 21, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER, ALA., IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama.

I make this request because the Chief of Engineers says that the proposition embraced in the bill is a very important one, involving as it does material changes in the adopted project, and it is commended by the Board of Engineers as very important, because the work is about to commence on the lock as to which the proposed change is to be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 9, after the word "proposed," to strike out "and the building of the said Locks 18 and 19 is hereby abandoned," so as to make the section read:

That for the purpose of improving navigation of the Black Warrior River above Lock 17 to Cordova and as far up said river as the foot of Sanders Shoals, 5 miles above Cordova and 56⅘ miles above Lock 17, and for the purpose of aiding and developing the water power at Locks 16 and 17, in cooperation with the Birmingham Water, Light & Power Co. (hereinafter styled "the company"), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of developing the water power of said river and supplying the public with same, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his decretion, to change the detailed plans and specifications for the construction of Lock and Dam 17 so as to increase the height of the pool level over the dam crest of Lock 17 to a height of 63 feet above the pool level of Lock 16, so as to render unnecessary the building of Locks 18 and 19, as now proposed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "terminate existing contracts at" and insert "enter into supplemental agreements with the present contractors for"; and in line 8, after the word "seventeen," to strike out "provided the construction of higher lock at Dam 17 is found advisable for the interest of the United States" and to insert "providing for the annulment of existing contracts or for their modification, so as to cover the work required for the construction of the higher lock and dam, as he may deem most advantageous for the interests of the United States," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend operations during investigations and to enter into supplemental agreements with the present contractors for Lock and Dam 17, providing for the annulment of existing contracts or for their modification, so as to cover the work required for the construction of the higher lock and dam, as he may deem most advantageous for the interests of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to equip Locks 16 and 17 with electrical apparatus for operating gates and valves and lighting same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, section 5 (4), line 17, after the word "of," to strike out "high locks and"; in line 21, after the word "of," to strike out "Lock and"; and, in the same line, after the word "seventeen," to insert "and such locks as may be necessary to overcome the lift between the pools created by Dams 16 and 17," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That should the construction of dam at site 17 be found advisable the appropriations and authorizations heretofore made for the costs of locks and dams on the Warrior River shall be available for the construction of Dam 17 and such locks as may be necessary to overcome the lift between the pools created by Dams 16 and 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, section 6 (5), line 4, after the word "develop" to strike out:

From the water wheels delivering a minimum of not less than 80 per cent of the theoretical horsepower from the natural flowage of the river at and during the dry season, upon the basis of a minimum of 1,200 horsepower daily per annum at Lock 16 and 2,000 horsepower daily per annum at Lock 17; the payment for such power so created at each lock to begin one year after the lock is finished and ready for transportation and power.

And insert:

From the normal flow of the river, for a period of 20 years, which rate shall be subject to readjustment by the Secretary of War at the end of that period and thereafter at the end of every 10-year period; and payment for the power created at each lock shall begin one year after the lock shall be finished and ready for transportation and power, and shall be made on the basis of a minimum of 1,200 horsepower daily per annum at Lock 16 and 3,800 horsepower daily per annum at Lock 17.

That the work and improvements herein provided for shall be executed under the direction and with the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, the structures provided for being always subject to the provisions and requirements of this act and to such stipulations as may be imposed by Congress or by the Secretary of War for the protection of navigation and property and other interests of the United States; and to insure the performance by the company of the acts and obligations imposed upon it by said contract, the Secretary of War may require the company to execute a bond in such an amount and with such surety as he may determine to be necessary. Whenever the company shall have acquired and transferred to the United States Government all lands to be flooded and temporarily overflowed and erected power stations sufficient to supply the Government with all necessary power to light and operate said locks, so much of said bond as was required for the performance of said acts shall cease or be reduced to an amount not to exceed $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 7, to insert a new section as follows:

SEC. 10. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, there is a rather trivial amendment which should be made. On page 8, line 11, after the word "require," I move to strike out the word "of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is rather an important bill to be hurried through at this time. I have not had an opportunity to look over it. I should like to have some explanation of the bill from the Senator in charge of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I shall be very glad to give it. This is a very important bill in regard to the navigation of the Black Warrior River and the development of water power there. The present plan is to build a dam there of 63 feet and to build Locks 18, 19, and 20, each of 21 feet. This bill proposes to establish and build a high dam at Lock 17, which will back up the water of the river entirely to the railroads that pass over the river and beyond where it is contemplated in the present project. It will cost, the Board or Engineers estimate, about $150,000 more to build the dams, but the Government will receive a revenue of about $15,000 a year from the use of the water power. The completion of the project for the creation of the water power referred to will greatly facilitate the transportation of products from Birmingham to the Gulf.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator, does the bill undertake to recognize the right of the Federal Government to sell and dispose of the water——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. No; not at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Or the water powers of the State?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Not at all. It is in accordance with the provisions of the act passed by Congress in regard to fixing the rate or charge for the additional height of the dam that produces the power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to look into this bill, and I ask that it may go over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to say to the Senator that the bill is unanimously indorsed by the Board of Engineers and by the Chief Engineer of the Army, who speak of it as being highly important that it be acted on immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill can not go over on an objection, for it is being considered by unanimous consent. It has not been reached in the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. All of the amendments to the bill which have been agreed to have been suggested by the Board of Engineers, and have been so framed as to make it entirely satisfactory to the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I want to state that this bill was referred to the War Department and to the Board of Engineers, and all the amendments which have been agreed to have been suggested by the Board of Engineers. There is a report on the bill from that board recommending its passage. The questions involved in this bill are not such as relate to the water-power question in the West at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. They do not have any bearing on those questions in which I know the Senators from the Pacific coast and mountain States are interested.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I rise, really, to inquire generally about the same matter which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] have referred to. As I listened to the reading of the bill, it empowers the Federal Government to receive revenue from the water power of an Alabama river.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Water power created by the Government work.

Mr. DIXON. Created by the Federal Government?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. But, as I have always understood the matter, the waters of a nonnavigable stream, and even those of a navigable stream, belong to the State in which that stream is situated.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. DIXON. Does this bill contemplate the inauguration of a new policy on the part of the Federal Government to sell water power within the limits of the State where the water belongs to the State?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Not at all. It provides for the constructing company to put up the reservoir to impound the water of the river to make navigation more perfect, and to contribute to the increased cost of building the dam. Only $150,000 increased cost is recommended by the engineers, and the revenue, it is supposed, will be from $10,000 to $25,000.

Mr. DIXON. Does that revenue flow to the Federal Government?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It flows to the Federal Government through a company chartered by the State to do this work.

Mr. DIXON. Why should not that revenue go to the State of Alabama?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Because the State has already given this power to the company, and they have transferred it to the Federal Government.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think what the Senator from Montana has in mind is this: What is the reason why any license should be paid to the Federal Government?

Mr. DIXON. Yes; for water power in Alabama.

Mr. BURTON. The water power is created as an incident by dams constructed for the purpose of promoting navigation. Those dams are constructed by the Federal Government. This bill involves no new policy. On the Kentucky River and on the Muskingum River the Government for many years past has been receiving rental for water power created by its dams constructed for the purpose of navigation.

Mr. DIXON. But does not that recognize the title of the Government to the water?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so at all. It recognizes, where the Government builds a dam and creates a water power which would not otherwise exist, that it has the right to charge for it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask, does the Government build this dam?

Mr. BURTON. The Government builds this dam. There are proposed additions to it in the way of flashboards, and so forth, which the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, allow those who are utilizing the water power to build. All the expenses for the dam proper are borne by the Federal Government in carrying out the plan to canalize the Black Warrior River, a plan adopted nearly 20 years ago.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have looked over the bill very hastily, and it seems to me to go entirely beyond the mere authority of the Government to deal with the subject of navigation. It seems to recognize the right of the Federal Government to dispose of water and water power in the stream.

Mr. BURTON. Not except as created by Government construction in the way of dams or locks erected primarily for the purpose of navigation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Section 6 of the original bill provides——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me to finish. Section 6 of the bill provides:

> That the company shall furnish, free of charge to the Government, at Locks 16 and 17, all power necessary for the operation of said locks, gates, and valves, and for the lighting of the Government stations and houses situated at said locks. And the said contract shall further provide for the payment by the company to the Government of an annual rental for its use of the water power at Dams and Locks 16 and 17 at the rate of $1 per annum per horsepower realized and developed.

As I say, I have not had time to go over the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, two provisions are contained in section 6, just read, which are in accordance with policies already adopted. First, it is made a condition in all cases where the Government grants the right to a private company or individual to utilize water power created by Government dams, the company shall furnish the power for the operation of the locks connected with such dams.

The second feature which the Senator from Utah mentions is also one already in vogue, that a certain rental per horsepower shall be charged in such cases. It would be quite unjust to say that the Government should construct these dams at a great expense—endeavoring to improve rivers through a hilly country, where locks and dams are necessary, and put such rivers on the same footing with the improvement of a river through a level country—and receive no revenue by reason of the expensive construction of the locks and dams.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to explain to the Senator from Utah that if there should be any assumption of the right on the part of the National Government to deal with the water, that would in no way affect or bind the legal claimants to the water in the stream. It can only dispose of whatever rights it may have in the water, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. Certainly, no action taken by the National Government in this way could bind any legal claimant to the water or his right either as an appropriator or as a riparian owner.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will state that this bill does not involve the principle which governs where a private individual or a private company constructs a dam and the Government seeks to obtain payment for the water. I have been utterly opposed to that proposition; but this is a case where the Government constructs a dam in aid of navigation, and as an incident to it there is a water power, and the Government, on account of the expense it has been put to, charges for the use of that water. That is all that is involved in this bill, which is carefully guarded by the amendments which have been suggested by the War Department.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, while I had intended to ask that the bill go over, under the explanations made I have no further objection to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The explanation just made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is satisfactory to me. I did not at first understand the bill, because it is a long bill and there has been no opportunity of reading it. I simply caught a fugitive expression here and there, and I do not want to give my vote to any bill which will recognize the right of the Federal Government to dispose of the waters or the water powers in any State.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Utah, and I myself shall stand against any such proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the power of the Government to the use of streams is limited to navigation purposes. It is perfectly proper for the Government to improve a stream in order that it may be made navigable. The Government's function is complete when it has created the navigation or aided it. The sale of water is something entirely disconnected from the creation of navigable conditions in a stream, and I am not able to see why the Government may charge anyone for the use of water after it has performed the function of creating a navigable stream. The title to water can not be acquired by anyone; it is the title to the use of the water that may be acquired, and not to the water itself.

The Government having impounded the water may use it to the limit of the purposes contemplated by the Constitution, but not beyond. The Government has no legal right to sell this water to anyone or to charge for its use, because, upon the face of the bill, it is a measure in the interest of the promotion of navigation. That being effectuated, the power of the Government ceases. I do not feel inclined to go into that question further than to make the suggestion this morning. It is a question of very great importance.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BURTON. I would suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the question raised by him has been repeatedly decided both by the State and by the Federal courts. I think the case of the Kakauna Water Power Co., of Wisconsin, in the Supreme Court of the United States, is one of them. The tenor of these decisions is that where the right is given to create navigation, and where, as an incident to the exercise of that right, water power is created, the Government, or, indeed, a private corporation owning the franchise, can utilize the water power or sell it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question is, Where can it utilize it; at what point? The decisions are uniform that after the Government has accomplished the purpose which it is authorized to effectuate anyone may locate water rights under the laws of the State, not under the laws of the United States, for the United States Government has no law under which water rights may be located.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose, however, in the construction of an important public work dams are constructed and water is impounded, and in the liberation of that water, water power is created, is there any reason why the Government should not receive compensation for it? The water power is a necessary and inevitable incident of the improvement.

Mr. HEYBURN. But this bill is not within that question.

Mr. BURTON. I think it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. The improvement authorized is not created for any other than navigable purposes, because the bill says so.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. May not the power have been created with a view to the fact that the cost may be materially reduced by the application of the proceeds of the power created?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no law on the subject.

Mr. ROOT. That is, may it not be that a very salutary improvement may depend upon the fact that its creation would not be all a matter of expense, but that it would, while improving navigation, at the same time pay for itself in some part by the creation of a disposable water power? Is it not desirable that that view should obtain?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator is appealing to the law of expediency, but there is no law of the land under which that can be done. It might be that such a law could be enacted, but there is no existing law; and the only rule to which the Senator's reasoning applies is that of expediency, as to whether such a law should not exist. None exists to-day.

Mr. ROOT. But we can make one, and do we not make one if we pass the bill of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what I am afraid of. If that bill can not be invoked in the future as a basis for establishing the right of the Government in relation to water, I would have no word to say about it, but I listened very carefully to the reading of it——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think the State has the right to the water?

Mr. HEYBURN. Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. This is confined to the corporation that is named in this bill. It is to impound the water above where it is backed up by this dam, to preserve the navigation of the river all the year round, and to improve it in that way.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the authority of State legislation?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Under the authority of State legislation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why should the State legislation be supplemented by an act of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It is because the original proposition provided for the construction of a dam 31 feet high and for one lock. Now it is proposed to build a dam 63 feet high and put in three locks at that place.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why do we not stop with conferring the power to build the dams 63 feet high? Why is it necessary to invade this other very dangerous field?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do not think there is any danger at all, because no water is diverted from the river—not one particle. It will improve the navigation of the whole length of the river to the Gulf.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I could be convinced that the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that this bill might be the initiation of a construction to be placed upon the law authorizing the Government to sell water is not to be acquiesced in I would not raise my voice in this matter. But it is in order to be sure that that will not be done that I want the record which will accompany the passage of this bill to show that Congress did not consider this as the initiation of, or recognition of, a new principle.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Idaho in that.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. There is a further consideration, though perhaps not a very important one. These works have to be maintained, and, if they have to be maintained, it is certainly good policy to so provide that they may take care of themselves without being a continual burden upon the Public Treasury. The application of the water power that is created by them to the maintenance of the project certainly would seem to be desirable.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is still the law of expediency.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not the law of the land.

Mr. ROOT. But of importance as a matter of expediency.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only rose in order to perfect the record in this case. Were I convinced or did I think that this would be, as is suggested by the Senator from New York, considered as entering upon a new system, which recognizes the right of the Government to charge either a State or the citizens of a State for the right to use the water flowing in a public stream, I should perhaps be much more insistent in my opposition to it. I think the Senator from Alabama is in accord with the views I have expressed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Thoroughly.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I want the record to show that this is not to be taken as a recognition by Congress of the right to make such charges.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should not have introduced the bill if I had thought it accomplished such a purpose as that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will be agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question for information. In what way does the construction put upon it by the Senator relieve the bill from the express stipulations that a certain amount shall be paid for the water? I am asking for information.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are so many interruptions and there is so much noise——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. That I am not quite sure that I caught correctly the question of the Senator from Georgia. Will the Senator kindly state the question again?

Mr. BACON. I understood the objection which the Senator urged was that the Federal Government had no such property interest in the water as would enable it either to sell or lease the water power. Then I understood the Senator to have suggested some construction of this bill which would avoid that conclusion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am far from being satisfied that a construction of this measure would not, if it were to be taken as a precedent, as in a case in court, lead to the conclusion that the Government would not hereafter claim the right to sell the water in public streams. No one has title to water flowing in public streams. That was established by the Supreme Court at an early day, and that has been the law, and it is not controverted. No title exists in the water. It is only in the use of power. That is a clearly defined difference. Now, in this case, as I understand the bill, the Government is proposing to sell the right to use the water because it has impounded it, for an entirely different purpose, having it on hand, so to speak.

According to the law of expediency invoked by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], it says, "Having this water on hand, we might as well make some use of it." But the law of the land says that that does not authorize any use of it except in pursuance of the laws of the State; and it is a serious question; and if this bill passes I want it to pass with this record, so that hereafter the discussion invoked by the submission of the bill may always tend to explain the position of Congress in enacting such a bill.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Idaho takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. I am seeking light; I am as anxious as is the Senator to assist, if I can, the Senator from Alabama in the matter without compromising what I consider to be a serious principle. I desire to know in what way has the Senator reconciled himself to it, in order that I may see if I may, pursuing the same road, reach the same conclusion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not reconciled to it, and my vote will perhaps indicate that.

Mr. BACON. In what way does the Senator propose that our action to-day shall not be taken as a precedent?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Congress does not establish precedents that are as binding as in the case of decisions of courts.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; but I understood the Senator to say that a certain construction was going to be announced, for which we have to answer in the future, whenever a similar right may be sought to be exercised.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not necessarily a precedent, but that the question shall still be open when presented on another occasion.

Under the law of Alabama, or any other State of the Union, the water flowing through these locks or over that dam is subject to appropriation by any citizen of the State. Congress can not take away that right. There is not a State which has not protected that right in its citizen.

Mr. BACON. I can perceive of certain arrangements which might be made which would avoid this difficulty. I recollect that a colleague of the Senator in a former Congress proposed that dams should be constructed at the joint expense of the Government and some private enterprise, with the stipulation that, having joined in the construction of the dam, the parties thereafter should have the right to use the water, the assumption being of course that it was their own land. If the parties owned the land, they would have the right to use the water.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought it was in the nature of a loan, to be repaid, and did not come to the question of the title to the use of the water. For instance, in the reclamation act, the Government only loans the money. It does not become the proprietor. It becomes the agent only, and the money is repaid to the Government. That does not involve the question of title. But in this case the question of title seems to be involved.

Now, let me give a concrete instance in regard to this use of water: Should the Senator from Georgia or any other person build a dam in a stream in which the water was flowing through the State, for the purpose of diverting the water to create power, the surplus water running over the dam could be appropriated or located by any person. He has no title to it at all. That is the universal law, and there is no decision to the contrary.

You may go to the end of a tailrace, below a mill in which the power is generated and located, and nothing can prevent you. The water has been released from the control which was obtained under the appropriation as soon as it has passed the line. For instance, the water flowing over the spillway of a dam is subject to appropriation by any other citizen. No title vests in the person owning the dam. He has built the dam for the purpose of creating power, and may use it to the extent of his purpose or his right under the law.

This is an interesting point: Though a man may claim in his location 5,000 inches of water, if the conduit which he describes in his location notice—and he must describe it—will convey only 1,000 inches, he takes title only to the use of 1,000 inches of water. That is the universal law.

If a man builds a dam to any water in excess of that necessary for the purpose for which he builds it, he obtains no title. In this case there is evidently more water than is used for the purpose of navigation, and the Senator describes it—several Senators have—as incident to the creation of navigation, or the maintenance or aid of navigation. The fact is that the locator has not any title to the excess water above that which is necessary to properly fulfill the purpose for which the location is made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am extremely interested in this matter. In the bill I read this clause:

> And the said contract shall further provide for the payment by the company to the Government of an annual rental for its use of the water power at Dams and Locks 16 and 17 at the rate of $1 per annum per horsepower—

It specifies it at the rate of $1 per annum per horsepower—> at the rate of $1 per annum per horsepower realized and developed.

This is a specific case. Would that not establish the precedent that the Government might at any place where it had created a dam for the purpose of navigation raise the dam and charge this rental as covering its cost, as incidental or expedient, as indicated by the Senator from New York. Could not that be used for that purpose?

Now, I understand that this bill provides for a specific case, bearing on a specified location, and therefore is not intended to have general application. But why should it be done? Are you going to admit the right of the Government to raise a dam and increase the water power above the necessity of water for the use of navigation, and contend that it is then entitled to a rental for the water power throughout any State on any public stream?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think the Government has the power to create a right of that kind. The State can afford to its citizens through legislation the right to locate this surplus water, and no action by Congress could prevent a State from doing it, because the State has control of the water.

All of the great States have legislative enactments authorizing the location of water rights, and after this dam is raised to the height contemplated the citizens of Alabama can go in there, notwithstanding the fact that the Government is seeking to sell the water, and locate it. They could in the West, and under the law of Alabama I think probably they could. The courts of Alabama would undoubtedly hold that the right of a locator under the laws of the State was superior to the right of a person claiming under a contract with the Government, because the Government is selling something that it has no right to sell and to which it has no title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely desire an opportunity to vote against the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the bill. I shall vote "nay" upon the question of the passage of this bill, for I recognize no right in the General Government, by the Constitution or otherwise, to perform the functions proposed by the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I recognize that the building of these dams creates an opportunity for the use of the water power, and I am perfectly in accord with the desire that some scheme may be devised by which this water power may be used. At the same time I am not willing to concede that the Federal Government has the right to sell the water power of a stream within a State.

Mr. BAILEY. It does not belong to the Government.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator from Texas says to me, it does not belong to the Government. It belongs to the State or the riparian owner. If the Senator from Alabama will take his bill and so recast it that that difficulty shall be avoided, I shall be glad to give it my support; but I think that is a most vital principle, which it is dangerous to disregard.

It may be that the bill can be passed without that difficulty being remedied, but I desire to say that I can not vote for it, for the reason I have stated. At the same time I wish to add that I recognize the importance of the utilization of this power; and if there are conflicting rights of any kind or doubtful rights in the matter and the bill can be withheld so this vital principle shall not be contravened, I shall be glad to give it my support.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to make an observation with regard to the bill. If these locks are necessary for navigation, the National Government is amply able, and it has every right, to construct just such dams as to make the river navigable; but I will not vote for a bill which, in order to induce the National Government to improve any public stream and improve the navigation of the stream by virtue of the increased improvement, gives it the power to usurp the rights of the State. That is what this bill proposes to do—that by virtue of the Government creating a larger lock, and a greater water power, in order to reimburse it for this extra expense, it shall be given control over the water for other purpose than navigation.

If the Senator from Alabama will meet the question suggested by the Senator from Georgia, or recast his bill so as to separate the private or State rights to this power from those of the Government, I believe the bill will receive the support of this body.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have not had the opportunity to examine this bill with any degree of care. I would very much like if it could go over until to-morrow or next day, in order that all Senators may have an opportunity to give it further consideration. I dislike very much to oppose the bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama, but I dislike a great deal more to vote for a bill that, from a surface examination, such as I have been able to make, may not only establish a bad precedent, but, I am afraid, has other evils, if not connected with it, evils which may flow out of it.

In a few moments' time only I want to call attention to one or two matters. To begin with, if I understand the bill from a hasty reading, it proposes to enter into a contract, and the bill we are now passing is in some respects similar to a franchise granted by a municipality to some corporation desiring to operate therein.

If we are to concede that the Government of the United States is to begin the business of improving streams, building dams, and renting the property or the power out, then it seems to me perfectly patent that that grant should not be made to some one company without permitting all companies who may desire to bid for that power to have an opportunity to offer their bids, so that the best possible price can be obtained.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Missouri if he wishes to continue his remarks on the pending measure, but as he has suggested that he would prefer to have the bill go over, if he is willing to yield to me for that purpose I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. LODGE. The bill is not open to objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. It is under consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. And it has been ordered to be engrossed and to be read the third time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been ordered to be engrossed and to be read the third time.

Mr. LODGE. The question is on its passage?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on its passage.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. The amendments have not been concurred in in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

Mr. LODGE. The amendments have been concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And the bill ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. LODGE. The question is on its passage.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think those who have given consideration to this matter would like to have the amendments voted upon separately, because, as I understand it, and I ask the Senator from Alabama to correct me if I am mistaken, the amendments contain all the provisions with reference to the price to be paid for the use of water.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. No; they do not.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I heard the amendments read I think many of them refer to that question. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Missouri is willing to yield to me for the purpose, I understand that my motion will be in order. If it is entirely agreeable to the Senator, I would suggest that the bill shall go over to another day, that we may proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. That can only be done on motion?

Mr. PENROSE. I have made the motion.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I hope the bill will not go over——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has the floor and yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I hope the bill will not go over, because the project of completing the improvement for navigation on Black Warrior River is held up pending action on this bill; and if it is passed in the present shape, adopting the recommendation of the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers, who state that it will vastly improve the navigation and put up the trade to the railroads stretching out from Birmingham, producing millions of tons of trade. It can be completed in a little over one year, whereas it would take three years to finish the project as originally contemplated.

I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the bill recognizes the right of the State to control the surplus water, and it is the corporations organized by the State who will expend over a million and a half dollars for the purpose of impounding the waters above the dam in order to continue the flow for navigation during the dry season. I hope very much that the bill will not go over.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like, with the permission of the Senator from Missouri, to ask the Senator from Alabama to explain clearly, so that I may understand it, why this rental should be proposed to be paid to the Government of $1, as here stipulated in line 25 on page 6 and lines 1 and 2 on page 7?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Simply because the Government is raising the dam from 21 to 63 feet.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is the Government raising the dam for the purpose of improving navigation or to furnish this power?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. For the purpose of improving navigation purely. The engineers say it is the best plan that can be devised for improving the navigation of the river, but incidentally it creates a water power, and the State having the right to the surplus water not needed for navigation, this right is conferred upon this corporation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask, and I am asking, a question seriously for information. Why, then, should the proposition be made to give the Government $1 per so many horsepower?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I say it is because of the increased cost of the improvement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Therefore the proposition is, in order to get the Government to raise the dam to create this water power, it is to be reimbursed, when, by raising the dam creating the water power, it will also increase the navigability of the stream.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It certainly will. It is a mere incident to it. The power is developed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask, with the permission of the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania made a request of the Senator from Missouri. Does the Chair understand that that request was declined?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I was not given the opportunity to accept it or decline it, because other Senators rose to ask questions. I would have preferred finishing the sentence I was uttering, but I am quite content that it shall stop here and that the Senator from Pennsylvania shall be recognized to make his motion. I did think it was only proper to allow these interrogatories to be made, and I am——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. With the permission of the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the Senator from Missouri yields the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. I would not persist in the motion if I thought it would delay the bill in which the Senator from Alabama is interested. I believe it to be a meritorious measure, but I think there is evidently enough opposition to the bill to make it evident that he will get it through speedily by letting it go over a day and permitting Senators to have an opportunity to examine it. Therefore, with the consent of the Senator from Missouri, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to suggest that the very purpose for which I rose was to ask——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. The motion is in order, and it is not a debatable motion. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, on the 26th of January of this year the President sent to Congress a message in writing, accompanied by papers entitled "Correspondence embodying an agreement between the Department of State and the Canadian Government in regard to reciprocal tariff legislation"; also statistical data to show the effect of the above agreement upon the commerce and revenues of the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

The President in his message recommended legislation by Congress in accordance with the provisions of the agreement embodied in the correspondence thus transmitted by him. The bill which is now before the Senate, House bill No. 4412, is entitled "An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes"; and throughout the greater part of the bill; that is to say, down to the end of section 1, on the twenty-third page, the bill does follow the agreement which is described as between the Department of State and the Canadian Government in regard to reciprocal tariff legislation.

The action of the President in bringing before Congress this subject affecting the foreign relations of the United States in this manner has been the subject of criticism to some extent in the public press and to some extent upon the floor of either House of Congress. I should not refer to this criticism were it not that it has received the dignity and authority derived from the advocacy of the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], whose solid and sterling qualities we all recognize and admire.

I wish to submit to the Senate, sir, that the President has followed a course in bringing this subject before Congress which was entirely within his power, which was in accordance with precedents, and which was strictly in accordance with official propriety.

The agreement between the Department of State and the Canadian Government has been spoken of as a treaty. It is in no sense a treaty. It is one of those informal, temporary, and preliminary arrangements between the executive branches of two Governments which are exceedingly common and which are necessary for the effective conduct of negotiations regarding international affairs.

For example, in the year 1899, when the dispute between this country and Great Britain regarding the Alaskan boundary was at its height, the State Department entered into an agreement with the Government of Great Britain fixing the line on either side of which the jurisdiction of the respective countries should be recognized until such time should elapse as to make it possible for a final and definitive settlement of the controversy to be reached. That was not a treaty. It destroyed no property or jurisdiction and it created none, but it was a necessary arrangement in order that while the two Governments, through their constitutional treaty-making powers, were settling the question there might not be controversy and bloodshed. That controversy was ultimately settled by a treaty between the two countries for a tribunal to hear and determine the question, and that question has been heard and determined and has passed into history.

In 1906, when the controversy as to the rights of our fishermen upon the treaty coast of Newfoundland was rife, the Department of State and the Government of Great Britain entered into an agreement as to what the colonial authorities of Newfoundland should be permitted to do and should not do, as to what American fishermen should do and should not do. It was not a treaty, but it was an agreement between these executive branches of the two Governments temporary and preliminary to a final settlement, so that there might not be strife and actual conflict pending the settlement, and it held a condition of peace until by a treaty between the two countries and an arbitration the question was finally disposed of.

Mr. President, it makes no difference whatever whether the question is to be settled by treaty or by legislation so long as there is a question and it is deemed desirable by the executive authority charged with the conduct of negotiations that there shall be a preliminary arrangement until a final decision shall be reached upon the question by the duly constituted and empowered authorities of the two countries; it makes no difference whether those authorities who are to settle the question are the Senate with the President or the Senate with the House of Representatives and the President, whether the settlement is to come by the making of a treaty or to come by the making of concurrent laws by the two countries.

This agreement, Mr. President, is of a still lower and milder form than the agreements to which I have referred. It does not in its terms, as did those agreements, bind the Governments of the countries at all. It does not bind the United States nor Great Britain nor Canada. It does not bind the Government of the United States nor that of Great Britain nor that of Canada. It is merely an agreement relating to the course of conduct which will be followed by the President and the State Department on the one hand and the administration in Canada on the other, a thing which is done every day, without which the business of negotiation between different countries and the diplomatic intercourse between different countries can not be pursued. If a President or a Secretary of State or a minister of foreign affairs can not say what he will do, can not bind himself regarding his conduct; if he can not say, "I will answer your letter to-morrow"; if he can not say "I will give you an audience next week, Thursday"; if he can not say, "No action will be taken upon this until such time as you shall have had an opportunity for an interview and hearing," why, then, business can not go on. This agreement, I repeat, is but the most ordinary example of a class of assurance given by the diplomatic officers of one country to the diplomatic officers of another regarding their own conduct.

Now, the President has in a great measure executed the agreement that he made by the recommendation which he has sent to Congress, and when the matter comes before Congress it has no element of a treaty. There is no treaty. There is a recommendation from the President with the information that Canada, in case we comply with his recommendation, is ready to enact similar legislation on her part. What is now before us is a bill which stands upon the same basis as all other bills to be considered and to be enacted by the legislative power of our Government.

This bill might have been the product of a treaty. The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, might have made a treaty, under which there would have been an agreement to submit this legislation to Congress. He did not do so. There would have been no object in his doing so, because it would have resulted merely in making the same submission to the legislative power which is now made. He has taken the simple, direct, natural, and proper course in making this recommendation to Congress in accordance with his constitutional authority, and acting in good faith, pursuant to the agreement which he made regarding his own conduct and in accordance with his right, with precedent, and with propriety.

Mr. President, the agreement which was submitted to Congress by the President meets with my approval. There were many reasons why it naturally appealed to me and why my first impulses were to favor it, because by long years of labor in the direction of the settlement of differences and the promotion of kindly and friendly feelings between this country and Canada, I have acquired that habit of mind. Be that as it may, I was at the beginning, and always have been and am now, in favor of giving effect to the President's recommendation for the reciprocal arrangement with Canada.

But, Mr. President, I have not been permitted to maintain that view in any complacent or untroubled mood. It has been impossible for me to so steel myself against the opposition of the farmers of northern New York and of the paper-making communities of northern New York, in which tens of thousands of people are dependent upon that industry, that I could hold my course in support of this reciprocity agreement without disturbance and solicitude.

The farmers of northern New York, more in number than the entire inhabitants of many of the States represented in this Chamber, are in a great measure opposed to this agreement, and they have by thousands of communications to me made their opposition known. They fear that it will result in the reduction of the price of their products and in the depreciation of the value of their lands, and in making harder the severe conditions of their lives. I can not but be affected by their representations. They are the people among whom I was born and grew to manhood, among whom I live, and I would not have them feel that I am unmindful of their interests; nor, Mr. President, can I be indifferent to the speeches which I have heard here in this Chamber—speeches made by old and tried associates, upon whose sincerity I would stake everything I possess, for whose judgment I have respect, and with whose deep and evident feelings I have sympathy. But, Mr. President, nevertheless, I do still believe that the enactment of this reciprocal agreement with Canada is for the best and the permanent interest of our country, and I must be for it.

I think, sir, that my friends, the farmers in New York and the farmers all along the northern border, are unduly apprehensive. I think that they have greatly exaggerated in their own minds the injury which will come to them from the enactment of this measure. It is but natural that they should. All experience in the enactment of tariff laws indicates that those whose business is to be affected greatly exaggerate the injury which they apprehend from any legislation that at all reduces the measure of protection which they have had; and if it be true, as would appear from the report of the hearings before the Committee on Finance, that an organized effort has been made, with agents or attorneys employed to circulate among the farmers of the country statements of the injury that will be done to them, in order to arouse them to opposition to this bill, it follows necessarily that the arguments would lose nothing in the telling, and that to every farmer would come a tale of apprehension and of anticipated injury, painted in the most vivid colors. So that it is but natural that this feeling should exist; but I think it is greatly exaggerated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to interrupt the course of the argument of the Senator from New York, but I desire to ask if the Senator proposes before he closes to state whether or not, in his judgment, the reciprocity measure will affect the interests of the American farmer?

Mr. ROOT. Yes. I think, Mr. President, that the apprehension of injury, which is natural to any class of producers as to whom there is a proposal to reduce the tariff, is very readily to be answered by the fact that the two countries are under substantially the same conditions. There may be little differences in labor cost here and there, but, in general, by and large, the labor conditions of Canada and the labor conditions of the United States are the same. It is not a question of competing with the familiar adversary, the pauper labor of Europe. The two countries are similar in their social conditions, in their laws, in their manner of doing business, of thinking and of acting, in their individual independence, and in their power to maintain their wage scale; and the proposal to take down the tariff wall between Canada and the United States, in so far as it is taken down by this reciprocity agreement, is much more like the taking down of a tariff wall between two States than it is the taking down of a tariff wall between the United States and the countries of Europe; and, for reasons which I shall give presently, I think that any ill effect that may be produced upon any of our farmers will be more than counterbalanced by the advantages which they will derive in common with the whole American people from the enactment of the bill.

Mr. President, I could not be indifferent to what has been said upon this floor as to the effect of this measure upon the general policy of protection. We have been told here that if this bill be passed it will drive a wedge into the protective system that now obtains, will rend it asunder, will split it into pieces, and will destroy it. We have been told that if this bill passes the farmers of the Northwest will see to it that the manufacturers of New York and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania suffer in their turn. These are serious propositions, Mr. President, for one who believes, as I believe, that the policy of protection has played a great part in the building up of the prosperity and the happiness of our country, and who believes, as I believe, that to continue the policy of moderate protection, reasonable protection, based upon ascertained facts, is of high importance to the future prosperity and happiness of our country.

A serious picture is presented to us by these declarations coming from men whose sincerity we respect; but, Mr. President, it appears to me that throughout this whole discussion, and very much of late in other discussions in this Chamber which have touched upon tariff questions, there has been always a suppressed premise—an assumption never stated but always present—that what we make tariff laws for is to benefit the manufacturer or the miner or the farmer or whoever may be engaged in the industry that we protect.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit me to read——

Mr. ROOT. I beg the Senator not to interrupt me at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. ROOT. I shall be very glad to afford the Senator an opportunity to read anything when I get through, but at present I would rather be permitted to go on.

Mr. BORAH. I will not, then, interrupt the Senator. I only wanted to read a statement of ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed upon the question the Senator is now discussing.

Mr. ROOT. That is something which it is manifestly unfair to ask me to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I say there is running through the discussion of this subject the assumption that we make tariff laws for the benefit of the people who are engaged in the industries. That I deny. We make, or we ought to make, no law for the benefit of any man or any group of men. We care no more, Mr. President, neither you nor I, nor the Senators about me, for any manufacturer, great or small, of any article, be it steel or wool or cotton or whatnot, or for any miner, whatever he may be taking from the earth, or for any farmer, or for any granger upon this earth than we care for the men who are using their products. And we do not protect them for their benefit.

We pass all laws putting protection on the products of industry for the benefit of the whole American people, and if we can not sustain the imposition of a duty upon that ground, then it ought not to be imposed. If we do legislate for the benefit of the people engaged in any particular industry, then we are perverting our powers; are false to our duty.

Mr. President, it is because for the moment, for the time being, the people of the United States have come—many of them; I hope not all, but many of them—to believe that we have forgotten this primary and fundamental rule of tariff legislation, because they have been led—misled, I believe—into the conviction that we have been legislating for particular men or particular groups of men instead of legislating for the interests of the whole country, that the people overturned the majority in the House of Representatives in the last election and very nearly, and in a certain sense altogether, changed the political complexion of the Senate.

Mr. President, when my friends, who declare that this legislation, if it be enacted, will be the death blow of protection, and their constituents, in the cool afterthought, consider, as they will consider, the interests of the whole people, they will forget their revenges, and they will vote in accordance with their principles, under the guidance of their love of their country, for protection or against protection, and if for protection for such measure of protection as they believe will help not the manufacturers of New York or Massachusetts, but the whole people of our country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator believe that while the public may forget their revenges in forgetting they will lose their sense of justice and equal justice to all the people?

Mr. ROOT. I do not. I count on their keeping it, and I know they will keep it and will act under their sense of justice——

Mr. DIXON. But, Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. A sense of justice to the whole people of the United States. Mr. President, let me say this: No economic system, be it for protection, be it for a tariff for revenue, be it for free raw materials and high duties upon finished products—no economic system can stand upon any other basis than that which I am pressing as a necessary basis on which we must act regarding this legislation and on which my friends who are opposing this legislation ultimately will act.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROOT. I hope the Senator will excuse me for just one moment. I believe a reasonable policy of protection is beneficial to our country; I believe it tends to make it more prosperous, more happy, more useful in the world, and that it provides a better home for our people, with greater opportunities for every one of us. But, Mr. President, I know that that view of protection can not prevail if protection is to be rested by its advocates upon a system of bargain and trade. I believe in protection, but I wish to buy no man's vote for it. If the majority of the people of the United States come to the conclusion that it is better for the country to abandon protection and establish a revenue tariff or free trade—under any name whatever—then let them do it, and I for one will put out no hand to stay them by bargaining and trading the respective private interests of different parts of our country. If they are wrong in abandoning protection, then they will find it out and come back. If they are right in abandoning protection, then we will confess our error, according to the outcome.

And, Mr. President, if we have so sinned against the duty of keeping always an eye single to the interests of all our country as to leave the system of protection to be tried not upon its merits, but upon its abuses, then we must endure the tribulation that is to come upon us before the hard lesson is learned that there is a sound and impregnable basis for a protective tariff law which concerns no private or individual interest, but concerns the power and prosperity and happiness of our whole country.

I wish to say one word further with special reference to the effect of this law upon the farmer. If I were at home I would say it in private conversation to my farmer friends about me in the country, and that is this: The taking off of the duty on farm products between this country and Canada, while it will in a technical sense, a strict sense, be accomplished by the passage of this bill, nevertheless was inevitable; and if it did not come in this bill it would come in its own way by ordinary tariff legislation.

No one can mistake, no one ought so to blind himself as to mistake, the changed feeling of the people of this country regarding the tariff as exhibited by the election of last fall, and not only by the election of last fall, but exhibited in 10,000 expressions all over the country and exhibited in the highest degree by the possibility of this reciprocal arrangement.

No one may suppose that this arrangement could be made by the President, carried through the House, certain of passage here in the Senate, if there were not a great public opinion behind it. What we say here is of little consequence. Our arguments do not advance or retard it. It is moving along with a public opinion behind it.

Mr. President, there is no one here who believes that there is the least possibility that the people of the United States, until another revolution of sentiment has come, will permit the cost of their living to be increased by the imposition of a duty on ordinary foodstuffs.

Mr. BAILEY. Why on clothing?

Mr. ROOT. Why on clothing? On ordinary foodstuffs, just as soon as the consumption approaches the limit of production——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Texas will excuse me for one moment. The Senator from Texas says, why clothing? Clothing does stand on a little different footing with regard to the general principle, because it is an illustration of the original idea that it was desirable for the country to have manufactures. Yet that is practically unimportant, because the opinion of the country undoubtedly is in favor of a large reduction of the duty on clothing.

Mr. BAILEY. Why a reduction on clothing——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Why a reduction on clothing and a total repeal on foods? One is as much a necessity of life as another. If we do not eat, we will starve. If we do not wear clothes, we will freeze.

Mr. ROOT. Not now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. ROOT. But that is true in winter.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true. But there is another and probably a more potential consideration, which the Senator from New York has not overlooked. If we undertook to go without clothing, even in this warm weather, the authorities would put us in jail.

Mr. ROOT. That might improve our condition. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Now, you have the physical necessity in the winter and the legal compulsion in the summer time. You are under no more physical necessity with respect to food than you are with respect to clothes, and there is no law compelling you to eat, while there is one compelling you to wear clothes.

That being true, why is it that you are going to take the duty off of those necessities which come from the farm and not take it off of those necessities which come from the factory? There must be some explanation of that. The Senator says, because the factory was originally a part of the protective scheme. But the Senator from New York will not tell me—and the Senator from New York will not tell the country—that the factory is more essential to the prosperity and happiness of this country than the farm.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I suspect, if the Senator will permit me, that the reason for leaving it on the factory and taking it off the farm is that they fear that they may close up the factory, whenever the dividends disappear, and they know they can not close up the farm; that the farmer must go on producing at a diminished price; and he must meet a falling price by producing more as the price of what he produces falls, and in order to produce 50 bushels where 40 before sufficed, he calls his children from the schoolhouse to the field; and it is more the curse of the country that the farm shall fail in its prosperity than it is the curse of the country that the factory shall close.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has intervened upon a statement of mine as to the state of feeling of the people of the country by asking me why some whom he designated as "they" are going to take off one duty and not another. I say I do not know why the people of the country take the view that there ought not to be duty on foodstuffs. It appears to me that they do take that view, and I perceive a very strong tendency toward the reduction of the duty on clothing. Now, I will have to refer the Senator from Texas to the newspapers, of which I know he is very fond.

Mr. BAILEY. And with which I am about as popular as the Senator from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROOT. I congratulate the Senator from Texas upon the virtue which has brought him to that condition. I shall have to refer him to the newspapers to find out what is the origin and nature of that opinion.

Mr. BAILEY. I think I know.

Mr. ROOT. The fact that the farm will not close while the factory will close is suggested by the Senator from Texas. That distinction may be a reason for the difference in treatment. Whether it is the reason in the public mind or not I do not know.

Mr. President, I have stated my view regarding the inevitable result of the process which is now going on upon the system of food duties. I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer. They have been quite indifferent, affecting only several localities here and there, so long as our production ran far ahead of our consumption. But, with the increase of our cities as compared with our farming population and the using up of our waste lands and the fencing in of old cattle ranges and the reduction of the productive power of our land, we have about come to the point where the continuance of those duties, instead of being a matter of indifference to the people of the country, would result in putting up the cost of food.

I am not arguing the question. I am simply stating a reason why the farmers should not consider that this reciprocity arrangement is doing them any particular harm, because it is something that is sure to come to them anyway.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator believe it would be a bad condition to arrive at when consumption and production were about equalized with each other? Does he not believe, on the contrary, that we would get nearer an element of justice upon the price of the article sold and the price that is paid for it upon the energy expended in producing the article and the energy expended in securing the money to purchase it? Does the Senator really feel that there would be an injustice to the consumers if the farmers produced just about what the consumers needed; and will not the Senator agree with me that to-day it takes a great deal more expended energy upon the farm to produce a bushel of wheat than it takes in the factory or elsewhere to buy the flour that is in that wheat? Is not that a correct proposition?

Mr. ROOT. There are several propositions involved in what the Senator has said. As to his first question, about the result of production and consumption, I think it is desirable to have a production for export. So long as we have any money to spend abroad we will spend it, notwithstanding the vigilance of the customs authorities. We will expend some of it, at all events, and I think it is a good thing to keep the balance of trade in our favor. So I like to see a surplus of production.

As to the other question, I do not think that I quite understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. My proposition, I will say to the Senator, was simply that it requires far more labor on the farm to produce the wheat that goes into a loaf of bread than it requires in the city to earn the value of that loaf of bread.

Mr. BAILEY. The money to buy it.

Mr. ROOT. I am inclined to think that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then should not the law, in so far as the law affects the value of the property, tend rather to equalize this condition than to cheapen the product of the farm for the benefit of the person in the city who purchases it?

Mr. ROOT. No; I do not think it is our business to equalize that condition by law. I think that is a matter of trade, which should be equalized by the natural forces which govern trade.

Mr. McCUMBER. Have we not been equalizing those conditions by our protective system, and is not the whole argument of protection based upon the idea that we do equalize our conditions as against the conditions of the foreign markets?

Mr. ROOT. That is an entirely different question, Mr. President. It is not that we equalize trade conditions as between ourselves. We have never undertaken to do that by our tariff legislation, and I do not think we ever shall undertake to do it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I want to get some light.

Mr. ROOT. I am nearly through, and I hope the Senator will not——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. REED. It was with reference to a statement which I understood the Senator to make.

Mr. ROOT. Very well; I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator to say he concedes the point that it takes more labor to produce a loaf of bread than to earn the money to buy it in a city?

Mr. ROOT. I said I was inclined to think that was true.

Mr. REED. I differ very strongly from the Senator on that point.

Mr. ROOT. I may be wrong. I do not make myself responsible for the statement, but I am inclined to think it is true that it takes less labor to earn the money to buy a loaf of bread in the city than it does to raise the loaf of bread in the country—that is, that less money goes to the producer. Of course, there may be, and frequently is, any amount of putting up of price through successive middlemen, who destroy the relation between the producer's reward for his labor and the consumer's cost for the article which he consumes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. The great problem of distribution, of bringing the products from the original producer to the consumer is a subject which very much needs attention, but it is no part of a tariff law or a reciprocity agreement with Canada.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask the honorable Senator from New York if it is not his admission here, from what he has just stated, that the farmer has received no benefit from the tariff; that he, in other words, has been hoodwinked with the idea that the protective tariff was protecting him? Is not that your statement, sir?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey puts a question to me and then puts a gloss on his question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want it glossed so that the Senator will not get away from it.

Mr. ROOT. Yes; but the Senator from New Jersey must not hoodwink my answer.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no disposition to do that.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, my own opinion is that the farmers have not in general been benefited by the protection upon their food products.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask, have they in any particular——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will please address the Chair and get permission to interrupt.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is a part of my original proposition.

Mr. ROOT. I must be permitted to answer the question of the Senator, because a question put by him is always entitled to respectful consideration. I think that here and there, at certain localities along the border, farmers have been benefited by protection on their food products. I do not think that as a class in general up to this time or until perhaps within a very short period, the protection upon food products has been of any real advantage to the farmer. I do not think that the Senator from New Jersey is justified in inferring from that that the farmers have been hoodwinked. I think that the farmers have, upon their own good judgment, believed that it was beneficial to them to have this duty, probably more because they were looking forward to the time when it would be useful for them than that they thought it had already been useful for them as a class.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The farmers have been looking for forty-odd years for the magnificent dream and the rainbow that was to come. But each year the struggle for the bread-and-butter winner and toiler has grown harder and harder and more bitter, while they have seen their farms sold out under foreclosure and the manufacturers growing wealthy beyond the dreams of avarice. Hence the farmers of this land have held up their hands to God and said, "Pray, how long!" and the last election decreed that it would be short. I can say to the distinguished Senator from my neighboring State, in which I was born, that your day of promise is too far off with your Republican talk of protection, and we want no more of it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from New Jersey has completed his question. He really ought not, under permission to put a question, make my poor, dull remarks the matrix in which shall shine the bright jewels of his eloquence. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, let me now pass to what seems to me to be the general and controlling consideration affecting this reciprocity agreement. I have always thought that the surrender of the right to impose tariff duties against each other by the original 13 States was the most valuable act forming a part of the Constitution of our Government. I have always thought that that played a greater part in the prosperity and progress and friendly intercourse of our States than any other thing that they did or refrained from doing in forming the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the existence of a political line between Canada and the United States does not militate at all against the proposition that in like manner the taking down of the tariff wall between these two kindred States, these two communities of people speaking the same language, living under the same system of law, with the same social and economic system, with the same wage scale in general, the same habits of thought and action, the same methods of conducting business, as similar in all respects as the people of the original 13 States were to each other, will bring the same benefits to the people of both countries.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suppose the Senator has considered, perhaps from that point of view, the difference that exists between Canada and the United States with relation to the imports from other countries which does not exist between the several States of the Union. I should like to have the Senator's view upon that point.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not think that that at all affects the general proposition which I am making. I can see that the fact that Canada has a different tariff from the United States, as against the people of all outside countries, may prove an embarrassment in detail; but as to the general proposition that the utmost freedom—the greatest possible freedom—of trade between Canada and the United States will bring to both countries the same great blessings that it has brought to the different States of our Union, I think this matter of detail plays no part whatever. I do not think, Mr. President, that the people of New York have been injured because there was full and free trade between them and the people of Pennsylvania. I do not think the people of New York and Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Massachusetts have been injured in the long run, by and large, by the opening up of the great wheat and corn fields of the western prairies and the valleys of the Mississippi and Missouri, and the plains, and the Pacific. I think that while they may have been required to change the character of their crops here and there, while they have been hindered here in a particular respect or there in a particular respect, the fact that they, with their farms and their farmhouses, their fields and their crops, were part of the great activity, having available to them the vast and effective machinery of a great and powerful and prosperous country, has overborne and counterbalanced a hundred times over any harm that has come to them from the freest competition on the part of these other communities.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I have agreed with many things the Senator has said. I would not object strongly to vote for absolute free trade between Canada and the United States. But the Senator omits the basic criticism of the Republican Senators here who are in opposition to this treaty; that is, the rank injustice of making free trade in agricultural products alone and still leaving tariff duties and tariff walls between the two countries on manufactured articles. That is what we complain of, and that is what I should like the Senator from New York to elucidate with his wonderful ability.

Mr. ROOT. I thank the Senator. I hope he is serious.

Mr. DIXON. I am.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, we are dealing now with a reciprocity agreement

Mr. DIXON. But it is not reciprocity.

Mr. ROOT. It is reciprocity so far as it goes, until you get to the second section.

Mr. DIXON. It is a jug-handled reciprocity.

Mr. ROOT. It is quite plain, and it is a fact—if it were not plain upon the papers, I think that we all of us know—that Canada was unable to go further than she did go in her reciprocal agreement regarding manufactured products, and we are left, therefore, in this position, that while our reciprocal legislation, that is, our legislation reducing certain duties in consideration of Canada's legislation reducing certain duties, goes only to the mark to which Canada could be brought in the agreement—the mark to which she found herself able to go in the agreement—nevertheless we are at liberty quite independently of that reciprocal agreement to go on and reduce or take off any other duties that we see fit.

Mr. President, I do not doubt that the American people will stand for doing whatever is just, and I do not want to prevent their doing whatever is just. If it is just and for the best interests of the whole country that the duties on the manufactured products of New York should be cut down, let them be cut down. That is no reason why we should not pass this reciprocity agreement. That is my view about it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. In one moment.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator think they ought to be cut down?

Mr. ROOT. I will not answer that question now, because we are not engaged in a general tariff discussion. I will say frankly to the Senator, I do not know. I have been hoping that from the study, the investigation of facts by the Tariff Board, we should get early light on the question as to what ought to be cut down and what ought not to be cut down.

Mr. DIXON. Should we not have waited on reciprocity until the Tariff Board reported?

Mr. ROOT. No; because the question involved in this reciprocity agreement, so far as it goes, does not depend upon any Tariff Board report, except this paper business, as to which I have been trying to confine the bill to the reciprocity agreement. The reciprocity agreement except in regard to that does not depend upon any Tariff Board report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, we do not need the advice of a Tariff Board until we touch the manufactured article. That is the philosophy.

Mr. ROOT. We do not need the advice of the Tariff Board until we come into some region in which the facts are so obscure and difficult that the man who runs can not read aright, so obscure and difficult to determine that we require the kind of assistance that a court calls upon a master in chancery for.

Mr. President, I wish to hasten to a conclusion. I have said that I think the same great benefits will come from freer trade with Canada that come to our States from tearing down the tariff walls between each other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to interrupt the argument of the Senator from New York; I am very much interested in it; but I should like to ask him a question. Does he not think that this agreement, even though it does not go to the extent he has indicated, may be a first step toward yet freer trade relations with Canada in manufactures as well as in natural products?

Mr. ROOT. I hope it will. I share in the hope that was expressed by the House in the concluding clause that they put into the bill. In all such matters we have to go step by step, and every friendly arrangement which is made between two countries which works satisfactorily to mutual benefit makes some further friendly arrangement more possible and easy.

Now, let me return to the proposition. The fact that there is a deeper and broader political line between Canada and the several States than there is between the States to my mind makes no difference whatever in the practical certainty that the same great benefits will come from breaking down the trade barrier. The political line is of no consequence in such matters. It is the character of the people, their law, their language, their business habits, their conditions of life, that make intercourse upon equal terms natural and easy, which are of importance.

Mr. President, I have regretted to hear remarks made from time to time, some I have thought through inadvertence, and sometimes I have feared with a hope of beating this reciprocity agreement on the other side of the line, about the annexation of Canada. Let us dismiss from our minds, if it has found any resting place in the mind of any of us, any such idea. There may have been a time, generations ago, when it was possible that such an idea should receive consideration. That time has long since passed. Canada, with her wonderful progress of the last 20 years, has become a nation, and she is instinct with the spirit of nationalism. Never in the most assertive and vigorous times of our young Republic was there a greater sense of patriotic nationality than exists in Canada to-day. The political line will continue between Canada and the United States. Her loyalty, her love for her mother country, will continue; her separate nationality will continue; but across the line of political division will pass and repass the messages of trade and intimate business relation and intimate personal relation, which will create for both peoples the blessings that our States have received from each other in our happy Union.

Mr. President, there is another consideration that I can not leave out of mind. When I consider the mighty power to which that northern neighbor is sure to grow; when I consider the 3,000 miles of boundary, when I look across the Atlantic and see the nations of Europe each an intrenched camp, each scanning the other across battlements and ranks of steel, with suspicion and distrust; and when I think of the possibility that we here may be robbed of the happy security in which we have so long lived by the growth of an unfriendly neighbor to our north, powerful and vigorous as we have been, I confess, sir, that all small calculation or detailed advantage or disadvantage sinks into insignificance compared with the overmastering duty of inaugurating and maintaining a national policy toward this infant of mighty strength—a policy which shall make two peoples bound together in the ties of friendship, rendering it impossible that we should duplicate the conditions of Europe.

Mr. President, one of the Senators here the other day recounted the number of times that Canada had knocked at our doors for reciprocity and had been turned away. Ah, yes; that is true; it is true that for many years we have conducted our Government under a policy that has wounded the people of Canada, has wounded their self-respect, wounded their feelings, made them indignant, and created unfriendly feelings toward the Government of the United States. It has been a stupid policy, and it is time for us to depart from it. Never again should the friendly approaches of this most friendly people be met with indifference. Now is the time, if we love our whole country and are willing to look far into the future, to shape our policy so that our strength shall help the growth of Canada and Canada's strength shall help our growth; that the power of each shall contribute to the power of the other; and that the enduring friendship of each for the other shall make the great English-speaking continent the strongest, the most prosperous, and the most happy part of the globe.

Mr. President, if this reciprocity measure is to be beaten, I hope it will be beaten in Canada rather than here. I hope it will not be beaten there; I do not think it will be; but let it be there rather than here, for the sake of the future, for the sake of the continuance of that good old agreement under which we have been for nearly 100 years without armament upon the Lakes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I simply want to ask the Senator from New York, if he can do so, to tell the Senate when in the last 60 years Canada has ever expressed a willingness for reciprocity with the United States in anything outside of natural products?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am unable to answer the Senator's question in detail. I know that Canada has frequently asked for reciprocity and has been met with indifference.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. ROOT. Yes; but let me finish answering the question the Senator has just asked. I know the subject was up for consideration in 1905; I know that it was up for consideration at the hands of the Joint High Commission in 1898; and in a few minutes, if I could go to the volumes of Foreign Relations, I could look up a number more; but I was quoting from a Senator who spoke here the other day, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. It is true that Canada has of late years, and perhaps always, put her special stress on natural products, but that does not at all vary or interfere with the proposition that I have just made.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I ask the Senator one further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have seen it stated in the public prints—I do not know whether it be true or not—that in the negotiations between the two Governments which have resulted in this agreement the United States offered to Canada free trade in manufactured articles as well as in natural products, and that Canada, following the doctrine she has held for 60 years, ever since the abrogation of the treaty of 1854, absolutely declined to go further than as appears in this agreement, which is confined substantially to natural products.

Mr. ROOT. I have no doubt that our Government was desirous of going further, and I will contribute to the discussion the interesting statement that the American commissioners in the joint high commission of 1898 offered to Canada free trade in all things upon the trifling condition that Canada would adopt our tariff, which naturally formed a disagreeable impression in the minds of Canadians, and which, of course, they were unwilling to accede to.

Now, Mr. President, a single word, and with a very few additional words I will be through.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator has unintentionally omitted something that he promised us in the beginning of this debate. I call attention to his statement that the injuries which the farmers of the Northwest would suffer would be counterbalanced by certain advantages which they would obtain from this treaty. The Senator has failed, as yet, to name any of those advantages. To make myself clear, let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the farmers of the North and Northwest raise from 650,000,000 to 700,000,000 bushels of wheat——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wanted to put it in the form of a question, and then to ask the Senator, if they raised that amount, are they to get an increased market in Canada for their 650,000,000 to 700,000,000 bushels of wheat, for their 800,000,000 bushels of oats, for their 170,000,000 bushels of barley, or for their 30,000,000 bushels of flax? Do they get a Canadian market for any one of those things; and, if they do not, what do they get in the manufactured products of Canada that would be an advantage to them?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should not think that the products which the Senator from North Dakota has enumerated would find any considerable market in Canada, but I have been very unfortunate if I have made no lodgment in the mind of the Senator from North Dakota with the reasons which I have undertaken to give that his constituents, in common with all the people of our country, will derive benefits from the freer trade with Canada that will counterbalance any particular injury or limitation upon the sale of their crops.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want the Senator from New York to name one benefit that they will derive.

Mr. ROOT. I have endeavored to state a number.

Mr. President, there is an amendment proposed to this bill. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], with that candor and courage that naturally accompany so acute a mind and so great ability as he has, has relieved me of any necessity of devoting very much time to explaining the relation of that amendment to this bill. I wish simply to state very briefly what it is. The agreement contains a schedule called Schedule A, and I now read from the heading of the schedule:

SCHEDULE A.

Articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States to be admitted into Canada free of duty when imported from the United States, and reciprocally articles the growth, product, or manufacture of Canada to be admitted into the United States free of duty when imported from Canada.

Under that heading in that schedule were enumerated a great number of articles, including pulp and paper. The bill, which was originally introduced in the House of Representatives, followed that schedule by providing for the free admission of those articles into the United States, with the condition that the President should find and proclaim that a bill for their free admission into Canada had been enacted. That bill was for the agreement pure and simple. That bill, however, was amended in the other House by taking pulp and paper out of that enumeration which followed Schedule A, putting it in a separate section—section 2—and dropping out the provision requiring the corresponding legislation on the part of Canada; so that, without any legislation on the part of Canada and without any provision being made for the free admission of our paper into Canada, it would, on the enactment of the bill, subject to certain conditions stated, come into the United States free of duty.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator from New York maintain that the second section of this bill is within the scope and purview of the reciprocity agreement as outlined in the message of the President and sent to the Senate?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I maintain that it is not; and I was trying to explain why it is not. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in the remarks to which I referred a few moments ago, said on Monday last:

Mr. WILLIAMS. A great deal of importance has been attached to the idea that the Root amendment is in strict accord with the agreement between the two countries. Now, I always like to argue things frankly, for two reasons: First, because it is an honest thing to do; and, secondly, because it is always the wisest thing to do. The President of the United States has made no concealment of the fact that the Root amendment does express the original agreement in so far as it was an agreement at all. The House knew it expressed the agreement, and because the agreement as it was made would have resulted in exactly what I have said, perpetually possibly, indefinitely certainly, continuing the hold of the International Paper Co. upon the paper business of the country, the House changed it that far, knowing that when it changed it, it changed the agreement on the whole still further in favor of Canada, and that therefore Canada would not object.

That is a very fair statement of the exact situation. The amendment which I suggested to the Finance Committee and to which my name has been attached was designed to put the bill back where it originally was, so that the bill would cover nothing but the agreement. To vote for that amendment would be equivalent to voting against the change of the bill that was made in the House and which added to the bill, in addition to the reciprocity agreement and beyond that agreement, a further and different provision, taking off the duty from pulp and paper, which the agreement did not require to be taken off.

Mr. President, it may be that, as the Senator from Mississippi believes, the provision of the House bill taking the duty off of pulp and paper without any compensatory legislation by Canada is a better provision than the provision in the agreement. I am not going to discuss that now. I say that it may be that it is a better provision; it certainly is a different provision.

I have become satisfied that the amendment which bears my name will not be adopted. For many different reasons a large majority of the Senate are going to vote against it, some because they want the bill to be bad, some because they are afraid the bill would not pass in another place if the amendment were adopted.

I am not going to discuss the question whether the duty ought to be taken off. It is a modest duty—practically 10 per cent on the importation of paper—but I am not going to discuss the question whether it should be taken off. It evidently is going to be taken off, but I do not want it done under cover of the reciprocity agreement, and I am satisfied to have suggested the amendment and to have had it discussed here, because the discussion has stripped off the cover of the reciprocity agreement that was spread over this independent pulp and paper provision so largely by public misapprehension, although, I believe, honest misapprehension, on the part of great numbers of the newspaper journals of the country. There was also much misapprehension here in the Senate for a long time about it.

The amendment the House incorporated in the bill taking off this duty and making the wood-pulp and paper schedule a separate and independent proposition is going to pass, but it is not going to pass under any false pretenses, inadvertent or otherwise. It is going to pass because this Congress means to take that duty off, and not because it is a part of the reciprocity agreement.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I will close in a moment.

Mr. BROWN. I wanted to ask the Senator a question right there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. With the provision in the bill as passed by the House, the duty would be taken off. With the Senator's amendment incorporated into the bill, it would not be taken off.

Mr. ROOT. Not until Canada took her duty off, which is in accordance with the agreement.

Mr. BROWN. That means never.

Mr. ROOT. No; it means the time the agreement specifies.

Mr. BROWN. What I want to get at is this: The Senator does not contend that his amendment removes the duty?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly not.

Mr. BROWN. But it leaves the duty now as it is?

Mr. ROOT. It leaves the duty until Canada shall comply with the terms of the agreement.

Mr. BROWN. In other words, it means that it never will be taken off.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the Senator's opinion, is it not probable that Canada would never comply with the agreement——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a moment—in the sense which he means, unless every Province in Canada removes the restrictions?

Mr. ROOT. I think that is probably true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the point I wanted to make; so that if just one Province continues to maintain the restrictions we would not get the free entry of paper.

Mr. ROOT. Precisely. That is true.

Mr. President, now let me say one thing more, and I am done. I am and have been for the agreement, the whole agreement, and nothing but the agreement. The amendment made to the bill in the House, which I wish to negative by the amendment to which my name has been attached, has added to the agreement another separate and distinct tariff provision. I am against that for one reason, because I believe that if you make this reciprocity measure the vehicle for discussing all the tariff questions that can be raised the bill will never pass. The bill as passed by the House in this respect, as I have said, may be better than the provisions of the agreement. There may be a hundred measures better than the provisions of the agreement. My friend from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] can doubtless put his finger on some that he thinks better; my friend from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on some that he thinks better; half the Senators here can do likewise. I was against the addition to the agreement of this separate tariff provision, and I shall be against the addition to the agreement of any other tariff provision; and I, with the very small number of Senators who vote for this amendment, will stand in a singular group of consistency, for we shall take the same view about all the proposed changes of this reciprocity agreement.

While I say I shall be against all amendments that may be offered, I wish also to say that I do not doubt that there will be some amendments offered which as separate and substantive propositions I should favor; I shall be against them because I think it is our duty, acting upon the soundest public policy and with the broadest judgment as to the benefit of our country, to pass this reciprocity agreement. When we have done that, at convenient and proper time, if, as the result of passing that agreement or the result of anything else that has happened or shall happen, justice and the public good require that further changes be made in our tariff law, my friends upon both sides of the Chamber will find me trying to be reasonable and just in meeting their desires and striving to agree with their judgment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has yielded the floor. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then for a few moments I should like to direct the attention of the Senate to a reply to the Senator from New York upon the paper schedule in section 2. The Senator from New York says that he is for the agreement, for the whole agreement, and for nothing but the agreement. It seems to me, however, Mr. President, that the amendment which the Senator from New York offers would make of section 2 an absolute dead letter, just as completely as if the Senator from New York should move to strike section 2 out of the bill. The Senator from New York knows, and every other Senator knows, that all of the Canadian Provinces will not waive, abolish, or do away with their export duty upon print paper, pulp, and pulp wood; and the Senator from New York knows, and every other Senator must know, that until that is done the United States will not admit pulp and paper and pulp wood from the Provinces in question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Permit me to finish my sentence. And the Senator from New York must know that so long as that condition exists, so long as the United States exercises its right to discriminate against a single Province of Canada, Canada will not admit paper, pulp, and pulp wood from the United States; and then, under the amendment which the Senator from New York offers, the President of the United States could not issue his proclamation and the United States could not admit paper, pulp, and pulp wood from any Province of Canada, although it is the very purpose of section 2 to admit these articles from such Provinces as waive those restrictions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska states without qualification that every Senator knows that if this amendment prevails it will practically nullify the paper clause of the agreement. Does not the Senator think that the negotiators on the part of Canada had an intelligent conception of what the agreement would do, and does he not think that the bill now before the Canadian Parliament, which contains the very provision embodied in the amendment, indicates that the Canadians are not so sure that the restrictions will not be removed as the Senator from Nebraska seems to be?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On the contrary, Mr. President, I think that the bill now pending before the Canadian Parliament proves conclusively that Canada anticipates and expects that the Provinces—or some of the Provinces—may not remove that selfsame duty on exports, and for this reason that the bill before the Canadian Parliament contains this proviso:

Provided also, That such wood pulp, paper or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but that——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is a manifest attempt in that bill to compel the United States to admit paper, pulp, and pulp wood from all Provinces of Canada regardless of whether those Provinces maintain their export duty or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that Canada is dealing in that proviso with her own Provinces; that it is not suggested that the United States shall make any compulsion upon Canada. The provision is that this so-called reciprocity shall become operative when we have access to the Canadian market and all parts of Canada, precisely what the bill in the Canadian Parliament says.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On the contrary, it was distinctly understood that the negotiators on the part of Canada were not able to guarantee to the United States that these export duties were to be removed by all the Provinces, and for that reason—desiring to have them removed—they consented to this proviso, embodied in the bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives, which, if we take it just as it comes from the House of Representatives will, in the course of time, be a force which will gradually compel one Province after another to remove the export duty, because any Province which maintains the export duty will realize in a short time that its market for wood and wood pulp is restricted. Not only will the American manufacturers be unable to buy Canadian wood and wood pulp without paying the American tariff, but the Canadian manufacturers will not be able to buy the wood and the wood pulp from that Province for export to the United States because of the proviso that paper made from those products shall not be admitted into the United States without the payment of the duty.

And hence it was believed by the original negotiators, and I have no doubt it was believed by the framers of this bill in the House of Representatives, that to maintain there the proviso that such paper, pulp, and pulp wood should only be admitted free of duty from those Provinces that abolished their export duty, would result in the course of time in forcing each Province, as a commercial proposition, to abandon the attempt to restrict its exports.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. SMOOT, and others rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield and to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield, first, to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Assuming for the sake of the argument that the Senator from Nebraska is right as to the agreement, I will ask him whether, as he understands the agreement, it provides or looks to future reciprocal trade in these articles after the prohibition may have been removed from Canadian timber? Does he understand that as a part of the agreement it looks to future possible reciprocal trade in these articles?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That would ultimately be the result of the measure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Now let me ask the Senator: Is there anything in section 2, which is now before us, that hints in the slightest degree at any reciprocal trade in these articles, even if the effect should be to cause the provincial governments to remove these restrictions? Is there anything in section 2 that hints in the slightest degree at reciprocal trade between the two countries?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is not in this particular bill; but as we know from an official publication published under the order of the Senate, the bill before the Canadian Parliament does provide that the American manufacturers of paper shall be permitted free access to the Canadian markets.

But, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming that the market in Canada for paper made in the United States is of comparatively insignificant value to the American manufacturers of paper as compared with the great benefit which they are likely to derive from the importation into this country of the raw materials or the partly manufactured material of wood pulp from which they manufacture their paper.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They themselves before the Committee on Finance and on every other opportunity have shown that one reason why they are at a disadvantage in manufacturing paper is that the Canadian manufacturer has the cheaper wood to manufacture his paper from, and the purpose of this bill is to give to the American manufacturer the cheaper Canadian wood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. WILLIAMS, and others rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just now to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Assuming that the Senator's argument is correct, has this section any place in a reciprocal bill? Ought it not to come in a tariff bill—properly before the Senate and the House as a tariff bill? In other words, the Congress of the United States to-day is engaged in revising certain schedules of the tariff—the woolen schedule and the cotton schedule. Why should we select from Schedule M one article in that schedule and leave the balance of the schedule untouched, thus effecting tariff legislation pure and simple under the guise of a reciprocity agreement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We would do that because it was embodied as one of the schedules which came to us from the President, and the language of the bill as it comes from the House is exactly in the language of the paragraph of that agreement as transmitted to the Congress of the United States by the President.

I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to suggest, in connection with the remark the Senator made a moment ago, that the evidence showed that the sole advantage of the Canadian paper manufacturer and the sole disadvantage of the American paper manufacturer consisted in the price of the raw material.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is very true, and I am at a loss, for my part, to understand why the paper manufacturers of the United States are making such a determined opposition to this paragraph if all they want is a fair opportunity to compete upon equal grounds with the Canadian manufacturer. The American market for paper is 15 or 20 times the size of the Canadian market, which is comparatively insignificant; and if what they want is to get raw material upon the same basis as the Canadian manufacturer gets his raw material this is the very bill that will give it to them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that the House bill is in conformity with the agreement between the two countries?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say that so far as the language of the House bill goes there is not a word in it that was not in the message of the President of the United States as transmitted to us.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator qualifies it now. He now says "as far as the language goes."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I used that same qualification before.

Mr. SMOOT. We all admit that. But the Senator qualifies his statement now. I did not catch it if he thus qualified it before.

In relation to the Root amendment, the Senator, in speaking a little while ago, said that the Root amendment has no relation to the agreement as negotiated, and that it was not in conformity, as I understood him to say, to the agreement.

I have here a telegram printed in the daily press June 8, which reads as follows:

> The reporting of the reciprocity agreement by the United States Senate was heard with satisfaction at Ottawa. The Root amendment to the pulp and paper clause in no way injures the pact from the Canadian point of view. It is known that Finance Minister Fielding, who is now in Europe, expressed the opinion that the Root amendment merely gives effect in a clearer way to the intention of the treaty makers. It is hoped here that the Senate will act favorably and promptly on the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say, in answer to the Senator from Utah, that I am not arguing this matter from the Canadian standpoint. I am not seeking to make an argument for the benefit of Canada. I am making an argument for the benefit of the people of the United States. I am making an argument for the purpose of showing that the Root amendment might just as well have been a motion to strike out section 2, because it will nullify section 2 and make it a dead letter, by making it impossible to enforce it.

And I may go further, Mr. President. I may say that the bill, as drawn and submitted to the House of Representatives, was first submitted to the President of the United States, and had then, and has now, his unqualified approval.

Mr. SMOOT. In his speech in Chicago the President plainly stated that the Root amendment was in conformity with the agreement, and I do not think there is a doubt about it, and I do not think there is any Senator in the Senate who will dispute it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He, however, said at the same time that any amendment, even though apparently innocent and even though upon its face designed to carry out the agreement, was likely to imperil the passage of the reciprocity bill; and that is the position we take here—that any amendment placed upon this bill is likely to defeat it.

Mr. SMOOT. You certainly will admit it is not going to defeat it in the Canadian Parliament, because the bill before the Canadian Parliament to-day has, if not the exact language, the meaning that is contained in the Root amendment. So if it can not defeat it there, and if it can not defeat it in the Senate, where is it going to be defeated?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah who is the author of the legal opinion he has just read in our hearing?

Mr. SMOOT. This is a reported statement from Finance Minister Fielding.

Mr. CUMMINS. A report from him, or a statement by some Canadian reporter with regard to some rumor with respect to the opinion of Mr. Fielding? Read it again.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read that part of it referring to him. It says:

> It is known that Finance Minister Fielding——

Mr. CUMMINS. Who knows it? Who is the author of this dispatch?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a dispatch sent by the Associated Press.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I see; gathering up the reports in Ottawa?

Mr. SMOOT. They have not gathered and reported very many rumors in relation to this bill which were detrimental to it; I will assure the Senator of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Or any other country.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know about that.

Mr. SMOOT. All the letters issued by the American Newspaper Publishers Association to every paper in the United States to support the measure were sent to their correspondents in Canada.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Utah is not asking the Senate to accept a rumor of that sort, disseminated by the Associated Press, as a deliberate opinion of a responsible minister of the Canadian Government, is he?

Mr. SMOOT. No. If it were based upon this alone I would not, but it is not based upon this alone, because Minister Fielding has already reported to the Parliament of Canada a provision in full accord with the Root amendment as carrying out the agreement between the two countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Nebraska, but whenever an opportunity is given me I intend to endeavor at least to show that the Root amendment is not in harmony with the agreement, but on the contrary is in exact opposition to the purpose or object of the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, the Senator disagrees with the President.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is not the first time he has.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that. I was going to say many other Senators do not agree with him either; but, of course, that is a question to be discussed hereafter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that the President has ever said that it was in conformity with the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. He said so in his Chicago speech.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no desire to hold the floor further and shall be glad to yield it.

I simply want to repeat that the inevitable effect of the Root amendment will be to nullify section 2, and if it is desired to do that we might just as well adopt a motion to strike out section 2 from the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The result of the Root amendment will be this: If Canada wants our market free she must make her market free to us. It is bad enough to have free trade between the two countries, but without the Root amendment the bill gives Canada a free entrance to our market and our manufacturers can not get into Canada unless they pay the 25 per cent duty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course I have very serious doubts whether the Senator from Utah would favor absolute free trade in paper between the United States and Canada, but assuming that he did hold such a position, the Senator from Utah must know that the Canadian Government possesses no power to compel her Provinces to do away with the export duty, and as long as she lacks that power to place it in a treaty or to place it in legislation it was specifically designed that the United States could begin to give free entry to paper and pulp and pulp wood to those Provinces which imposed no export duty, which in the course of time would, through commercial means, compel the other Provinces to do what the Canadian Government did not have the power to compel them to do.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator how he knows all that. It is not expressed in the agreement nor in the Canadian bill. And how does the Senator know the intent or design of the negotiators?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How do I know that the Canadian Government has no power to compel her Provinces——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; as to the agreement or as to the intent or design of the agreement that he was informing the Senate about. How does the Senator know the intent of the agreement? We can only judge by the wording of the agreement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will call the Senator's attention to some of the wording of the agreement

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to listen to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK (reading):

Provided, That such paper and board, valued at 4 cents per pound or less, and wood pulp, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise) or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Mr. SMOOT. Go right on and read the proviso.

Mr. GALLINGER. "Provided"——

Mr. SMOOT. Read the proviso. That is a part of the agreement as reported to the Senate by the President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am only reading that part to prove to the Senator that the Canadian negotiators took into account the fact that the United States Government desired to compel the Provinces to abolish their export duty; and not being able to guarantee that they would abolish the export duty, the negotiators agreed that the United States should only admit those products from the Provinces which did.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, if the Senator will read the proviso, the statement will be complete.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My statement is absolutely complete to show that the negotiators took the export duty into account and opened the door to the United States to secure the abolition of the export duty, although the Canadian Government itself was not able to guarantee it.

Mr. SMOOT. Every Senator knows that. But there were two parties to the negotiation, and the negotiators for the United States demanded that paper from Canada should come into the United States free, provided—now, if the Senator will read the proviso I asked him to his statement will be complete.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was to come in only from those Provinces which abolished the export duty.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, but——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] would make it impossible for anyone to get paper or wood pulp or pulp wood from any Province without admitting it from all Provinces, regardless of the export duty.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the wording of the treaty—that they are to be admitted from all parts of Canada. That was the proviso. Canada insisted upon it, and that is a part of the Canadian bill to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. All parts of Canada, provided those parts did not impose an export duty.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not say that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It says it exactly, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. Read the proviso.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But, as I have stated, I do not desire longer to occupy the floor. It seems to me a self-evident proposition that the Root amendment is essentially an effort to nullify section 2. The short way to nullify section 2 is to move to strike out section 2 and bring it to a vote on that proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In order that I may understand the position of the Senator from Nebraska, I desire to ask him a question. Is it his desire, by section 2 or otherwise, to incorporate anything in the pending bill that was not provided for in the agreement between the two Governments?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then there must be a difference of opinion as to the effect of the Root amendment and as to the effect of section 2. Would the Senator be willing, instead of section 2, to have the exact wording of the compact between the two nations restored to the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would not be willing myself to consent to any amendment which would send this bill back to the other body, where it might not finally reach concurrence.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Has the Senator so little confidence in the other House as to believe that they would want to put anything in the bill that was not included in the agreement?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have every confidence in the other body and am perfectly willing to take the bill as they sent it to us.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator has a degree of modesty as a Senator which he never had when he was a Member of the House.

PURE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 75), which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your attention is respectfully called to the necessity of passing at this session an amendment to the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat., 768), which will supplement existing law and prevent the shipment in interstate and foreign commerce and the manufacture and sale within the Territories and the District of Columbia of worthless nostrums labeled with misstatements of fact as to their physiological action—misstatements false and misleading even in the knowledge of those who make them.

On June 30, 1906, after an agitation of 20 years, the food and drugs act, passed by the Fifty-ninth Congress, received the approval of the President and became law. The purpose of the measure was twofold—first, to prevent the adulteration of foods and drugs within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; and, second, to prevent any false labeling of foods and drugs that will deceive the people into the belief that they are securing other than that for which they ask and which they have the right to get. The law was received with general satisfaction and has been vigorously enforced. More than 2,000 cases have been prepared for criminal prosecution against the shippers of adulterated or misbranded foods and drugs, and seizures have been made of more than 700 shipments of such articles. More than two-thirds of these cases have been begun since March 4, 1909. Of the criminal cases more than 800 have terminated favorably to the Government, and of the shipments seized more than 450 have been condemned and either relabeled or destroyed. In every case in which the food seized was deleterious to health it was destroyed. A large number of cases are now pending.

The Supreme Court has held in a recent decision (United States v. O. A. Johnson, opinion May 29, 1911) that the food and drugs act does not cover the knowingly false labeling of nostrums as to curative effect or physiological action, and that inquiry under this salutary statute does not by its terms extend in any case to the inefficacy of medicines to work the cures claimed for them on the labels. It follows that, without fear of punishment under the law, unscrupulous persons, knowing the medicines to have no curative or remedial value for the diseases for which they indicate them, may ship in interstate commerce medicines composed of substances possessing any slight physiological action and labeled as cures for diseases which, in the present state of science, are recognized as incurable.

An evil which menaces the general health of the people strikes at the life of the Nation. In my opinion, the sale of dangerously adulterated drugs, or the sale of drugs under knowingly false claims as to their effect in disease, constitutes such an evil and warrants me in calling the matter to the attention of the Congress.

Fraudulent misrepresentations of the curative value of nostrums not only operate to defraud purchasers, but are a distinct menace to the public health. There are none so credulous as sufferers from disease. The need is urgent for legislation which will prevent the raising of false hopes of speedy cures of serious ailments by misstatements of fact as to worthless mixtures on which the sick will rely while their diseases progress unchecked.

At the time the food and drugs act was passed there were current in commerce literally thousands of dangerous frauds labeled as cures for every case of epilepsy, sure cures for consumption and all lung diseases, cures for all kidney, liver, and malarial troubles, cures for diabetes, cures for tumor and cancer, cures for all forms of heart disease; in fact, cures for all the ills known at the present day. The labels of many of these so-called cures indicated their use for diseases of children. They were not only utterly useless in the treatment of the disease, but in many cases were positively injurious. If a tithe of these statements had been true, no one with access to the remedies which bore them need have died from any cause other than accident or old age. Unfortunately, the statements were not true. The shameful fact is that those who deal in such preparations know they are deceiving credulous and ignorant unfortunates who suffer from some of the gravest ills to which the flesh of this day is subject. No physician of standing in his profession, no matter to what school of medicine he may belong, entertains the slightest idea that any of these preparations will work the wonders promised on the labels.

Prior to the recent decision of the Supreme Court the officers charged with the enforcement of the law regarded false and misleading statements concerning the curative value of nostrums as misbranding, and there was a general acquiescence in this view by the proprietors of the nostrums. Many pretended cures, in consequence, were withdrawn from the market, and the proprietors of many other alleged cures eliminated false and extravagant claims from their labels, either voluntarily or under the compulsion of criminal prosecution. Nearly 100 criminal prosecutions on this charge were concluded in the Federal courts by pleas of guilty and the imposition of fines. More than 150 cases of the same nature, involving some of the rankest frauds by which the American people were ever deceived, are pending now, and must be dismissed.

I fear, if no remedial legislation be granted at this session, that the good which has already been accomplished in regard to these nostrums will be undone, and the people of the country will be deprived of a powerful safeguard against dangerous fraud. Of course, as pointed out by the Supreme Court, any attempt to legislate against mere expressions of opinion would be abortive; nevertheless, if knowingly false misstatements of fact as to the effect of the preparations be provided against, the greater part of the evil will be subject to control.

The statute can be easily amended to include the evil I have described. I recommend that this be done at once as a matter of emergency.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 20, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11019. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi first rose. The Senator from Mississippi.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article from the Charleston News and Courier of June 17 upon the subject of the Bristow amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what will be the permanent value to insert it in the RECORD. Some of the newspapers of my State have had editorials on that question, but I had not thought of making them a part of the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can only say to the Senator from New Hampshire that unless I had thought it was a valuable contribution to the discussion and a valuable thing in the way of forming public opinion through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I would not have asked the unanimous consent; and I can hardly answer the question more in detail without reading the article itself. I think it contributes to clarify the atmosphere upon that particular subject. I think it will have an influence with some Senators when the question comes back to the Senate from conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. The matter was very thoroughly debated on both sides. I did not participate in the debate, because I am not in the habit of talking much in the Senate now; but after the joint resolution has passed the Senate and gone to the other body, it seems to me we ought not to lumber up the RECORD here with all sorts of newspaper articles. That is the only feeling I have about it. Still, if the Senator particularly desires it, I will not object, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do desire it, and I would rather not be forced to read it out aloud.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not ask the Senator to do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would put me to trouble unnecessarily.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say that I think never in the history of the Government has so much extraneous matter been inserted in the RECORD, as newspaper editorials and speeches of individuals, as during the last year. While I am not going to object to the request of any Senator, I am very careful myself not to ask leave to insert these matters. I had a very interesting newspaper article the other day on the textile industry of the United States, which I thought ought to be printed, but I sent it to the Committee on Printing, because I was not quite sure that I ought to ask that it should go into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire as a general rule, and my only reason for asking this unanimous consent now was that I thought it would contribute to general information and to molding public opinion. The question having passed beyond the Senate, we expected that it would come back later on a different proposition, which is under discussion now, and I did not want to wait and take up the time of the Senate away from gentlemen who desire to discuss the immediate proposition before us.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been hoping that the House would accept the joint resolution as it was amended by the Senate, and that it would not come back.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection is heard, and the paper referred to by the Senator from Mississippi will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE BRISTOW AMENDMENT.

[From the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier, June 17, 1911.]

It is a rare event to find so many newspapers, of all shades of political opinion and in all parts of the country, united in the opinion that the adoption by the Senate of the Bristow amendment to the resolutions providing for the adoption of a constitutional amendment so that Senators might be elected by direct vote of the people was, in the language of Mr. Hearst, a piece of political hypocrisy. It is interesting, furthermore, to follow the discussion as to what would happen or what should happen in case the House should acquiesce in the Bristow amendment.

That stanch Ogdenite journal, the Brooklyn Eagle, thinks that "the effect of the constitutional amendment in its amended form would be the nullification of the restrictions now imposed by the Southern States upon negro suffrage." This surprises the New York Tribune, which proceeds to argue that "there is no grant of power in the Senate amendment which is not as old as the Constitution," but, strangely enough, omits to explain why in this event the amendment should have been proposed or adopted.

The New York Press, like the Tribune, a Republican organ, but with decided "progressive" leanings, and which has strongly advocated popular election of Senators, declares that "nothing could more clearly show the insincerity of the Bristow amendment to the Borah joint resolution for popular election of United States Senators than the character of most of its supporters," and thinks that "under cover of protecting the freedom of suffrage in the black belt the promoters of this insincere and unenforcible project intend to deny the people of all the States the right to elect their Senators."

The New York World, the most forceful Democratic newspaper of America and an advocate of direct elections, declares that "the Bristow amendment is unnecessary and mischievous," that "it merely arouses sectional animosities and repels the movement for the election of Senators by direct vote," and thinks, like the Press, that "the fact that LORIMER, DU PONT, GALLINGER, GAMBLE, GUGGENHEIM, ROOT, SMOOT, PENROSE, and STEPHENSON voted for it explained its real meaning far more clearly than the text itself."

The New Haven Journal-Courier, a strongly edited independent newspaper, regrets that the issue should have been beclouded by the injection of the Bristow amendment, and declares that "the people of this country have a right to decide what is best for them in the organization of their political household, and if in this regard the Senate has played fast and loose with them, those responsible will feel the lash of popular discredit when the time comes." The Hartford Daily Courant, Republican, quotes from a speech delivered in the Senate by Mr. RAYNER, of Maryland, last week, in which he predicted that it would take "a tremendous struggle in the Southern States if you put it (the Bristow amendment) in to carry, perhaps, any of them," and also from an interview which he gave to the Baltimore Sun, after the adoption of the Bristow amendment, in which he said: "I am satisfied that no practical danger will result from the adoption of this amendment." "Our own impression," remarks the Courant, "is that the Marylander was a better prophet last week than this." The New York Globe, Republican, thinks that the Senate amendment as passed was "fathered in prejudice or of a desire to mix things up and to prevent action."

These are the views of some of the most influential of the northern newspapers. Let us turn now to the South. That the resolution will meet with great opposition in this part of the country, if submitted to the States for ratification as passed by the Senate, is made plainly evident. The Montgomery Advertiser, for example, thinks that "the proposed reform is prohibitively dear if we have to buy it with our complaisant acceptance of the atrocious force bill which a small band of devoted and courageous Senators defeated in the last generation when it appeared certain of enactment." Another influential Alabama newspaper, the Mobile Register, thinks that "the legislatures of the South are not likely to accept the amendment upon the terms that it is offered. Fortunately, there is available the State primary, which meets the needs of the people in expressing their choice for Senators, so that no loss will be suffered if the amendment fails of confirmation."

The Petersburg Index-Appeal does not think that the evident attempt which has been exhibited to embarrass the South would succeed, but it is not surprised that "Southern Senators oppose the Bristow amendment, remembering the attempts by the Republican Party to enact the force bill, giving the General Government absolute control of the election of Members of the Senate. The attempt failed, but it showed the animus of the Republican Party."

The Athens Banner entertains the view that "if the advocates of the direct vote are in earnest and really want to see this amendment to the Constitution passed they will be speedy in their work of defeating the Senate amendment when it comes to the House for action. With that amendment tacked on, there is practically little hope for the ratification of the amendment to the Constitution, and there should be no hope for favorable action thereon, for such action would be to the detriment of the country."

The Newberry Observer and the Charlotte Evening Chronicle are agreed that, in the language of the Observer, "it might be better for the Southern States and for all other States that advocate State rights and are opposed to Federal interference in their elections to let things remain as they are for the present."

"We ought," says the Houston Post, "to have direct election of Senators unhampered by such a provision as Mr. BRISTOW would insert in the amendment." The New Orleans States hopes that "the Democratic House will think well and carefully before accepting the resolution as amended by the Senate." A like sentiment is expressed by the New Orleans Times-Democrat. "The voters," says the Times-Democrat, "understand the issues involved, and most of them have read between the lines of the Bristow and Sutherland riders. If the question is left open for a season, they can be depended upon, we think, to insure its early settlement in the right way."

Thus the matter stands. It is not likely in the circumstances that the House Democrats will accept the resolution as it has come from the Senate. Indeed, it would not be surprising if the trickery which again has been resorted to by that body should have the effect of bringing about a Federal constitutional convention, at which the matter could be settled once for all. That is not desirable in the present mental state of the American people, but the United States Senate seems determined to force it.

TARIFF ON WOOL.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it proper at this time to make a very few remarks concerning the message of the President concerning the pure-food law.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield.

Mr. GORE. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry at this juncture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma will state it.

Mr. GORE. I was addressing the Chair when House bill 11019 was referred to the Committee on Finance. I desire to submit to the Senate a motion upon that subject. I should like to know whether I will still be permitted to submit a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly. The Chair did not understand that the Senator wished recognition in connection with that bill. Certainly the Chair will recognize the Senator to make a motion in reference to the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report the same back on or before July 4 next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the bill which was laid before the Senate by the Chair be referred to the Committee on Finance with instructions, and that the bill be reported back to the Senate on or before July 4.

Mr. GORE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I regret the absence of the chairman of the committee. I have never known a proposition of that kind to be offered, I think, to the Senate concerning a very important bill, and I feel sure that the Senate will not agree to that motion. It would be a departure from all our custom in matters of this kind, and I think a very direct reflection upon the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I certainly have no intention to reflect upon the Committee on Finance, but I think there is a general feeling, at least on this side, that this woolen bill should be brought before the Senate as soon as possible. I do not care to obstruct the progress of the Canadian agreement at this time, but I should like to have the Committee on Finance understand that it is the sense of the Senate that this measure shall be reported at an early day. I may say further that I do not care to press the motion at this moment, during the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. CULBERSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma to make the date July 10. July 4 is a holiday.

Mr. GORE. I am aware of that, but the motion was on or before July 4, and I thought if we could be emancipated from Schedule K, or at least initiate the emancipation on that day, it would be well. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi and say on or before July 10, and on that motion I should like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. There will be some debate on that motion, I will assure the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state the motion, so that the Secretary may be sure of the date he now proposes?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, wait just one moment, that I may ascertain the day of the week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Saturday is July 1.

Mr. GORE. My motion is that House bill 11019 be referred to the Committee on Finance with instructions to that committee to report the same back to the Senate on or before July 10.

Mr. President, I am not sure whether the motion is debatable or not.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a debatable motion.

Mr. GORE. I do not think a motion to refer is debatable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it is.

Mr. LODGE. Any motion to refer is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a debatable question. Does the Senator desire to debate it?

Mr. GORE. It is not debatable in reference to petitions and memorials. Perhaps a different rule prevails in reference to bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no desire to debate this motion at length, but I want to suggest to the Senate in all seriousness that here is a bill involving very grave changes in our tariff laws. It may be my own fault, but I have not read the bill. We have been very actively engaged in work here during the time since the House has been considering this measure, and I certainly want very much to acquaint myself intimately with the provisions of the bill before I should vote to instruct the committee to report it back at any given time.

I personally feel, Mr. President, that the woolgrowers and woolen manufacturers of this country have a right to be heard on this bill, and a right to be heard at length on the bill.

We passed a bill relating to wool a few years ago. I am not going to stop now to enumerate what it did to the woolgrowers and woolen manufacturers of this country. It is a matter of history. Whether or not this bill will accomplish the same result, if it is enacted into law, I am not so sure; but, at least, we ought to have an opportunity to look at it. At least we ought to give to the Committee on Finance the usual courtesy of sending a bill to that committee for their consideration and giving them an opportunity to examine it. If they do not report it at a time that will suit the views of the Senator from Oklahoma, or any other Senator, a motion can then be made to discharge the committee from its further consideration and have it brought into the Chamber. But to do that when a bill is first presented to the body is so extraordinary, so unusual, so unfair to the committee and to the Senate itself, that I can not believe, however earnestly Senators may feel on this question, that they will vote in favor of the motion.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say about it. I chance to be a member of the Committee on Finance for the first time in my legislative experience. I feel personally that I have a right to consideration in this matter and that I should be permitted to examine the bill in the committee and to have it discussed there before the Senate takes it into its hands and deprives the committee of its usual privileges in matters of legislation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this bill refers to what is probably the most complicated schedule in the whole tariff law. It was framed after a careful and thorough investigation extending over months, and I may say years. It has received attention such as has not been given any other schedule in what is known as the Payne bill, or another preceding tariff bill.

As far as there is any record or public knowledge the bill has been reported from the House Committee on Ways and Means and passed by the House of Representatives without any opportunity for a hearing on the part of the great interests involved. It is a schedule which concerns the shepherd in the West and the manufacturer in the East, a schedule which embraces the varied industries of a continent, and the Senate is asked to pass upon it within two or three weeks after its reception by this body.

More than that, Mr. President, it would be idle to report the measure to the Senate until the reciprocity measure is disposed of, because this body could not be fairly or properly called upon to consider it.

If this motion is made seriously, it seems to me it is uncalled for and unreasonable. If it is simply made to call public attention to the zeal of the Senator from Oklahoma in favor of the bill, I hope the purpose will be satisfied and the motion will not be pressed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the doctrine of courtesy to which the Senator from New Hampshire alludes, it seems to me, is carried a little too far. There is certainly not a Member of the Senate who would be more unwilling than I to treat the Finance Committee with any discourtesy, but it does seem to me that this notion about courtesy ought not to stand in the way of legislation. It appears to me the essentials of the business life of this country are entitled to some consideration, and ought not to be thrust aside by talk about courtesy to a committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I did not put my suggestion upon that ground. I said it was usual to refer important bills to committees without accompanying the reference with instructions. But I went further than that, and I went to the very point the Senator has just now announced, that the interests of the people should be considered. That is true. The interests of the men who raise sheep and the men who manufacture the wool into clothing are entitled to our consideration and ought to have our consideration, and they ought to have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But, Mr. President, I think the 90,000,000 people who wear woolen fabrics are entitled to a little more consideration than the few people who raise wool or manufacture woolen fabrics.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. That depends upon whether they wear fabrics made out of American wool or foreign wool, or wear fabrics made in American mills or foreign mills. I do not think they are entitled to much consideration if we are going to blot out the woolen industry of the United States and import our goods for the benefit of the 90,000,000 people wearing them.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is just exactly the difference between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself. I feel that the people that wear these fabrics are entitled to consideration, and when they buy them they are not making any great inquiry whether the wool is raised abroad or in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some people are not.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The great body of the American people are not the people who have these articles.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I want to ask the Senator, What is his plan? Does he intend to set aside the reciprocity bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is no intention to set aside the reciprocity bill.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator intend to get the reciprocity bill out of the way by July 4?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Before the 10th. I hope it will be considered with all possible dispatch and disposed of as soon as possible; but in the meantime there is no reason why the Finance Committee should not be doing some work on other bills of great importance which are before it.

We talk about the necessity of having time. We have not heard anything about the farmers' free-list bill, which has been before the Finance Committee for several weeks. If they are so anxious to have hearings, why have they not had some hearings on the farmers' free-list bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have had some.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to discuss all three bills at once. I am only trying to find out what the plan is. If the plan is to give instruction to the Finance Committee to report at once, or practically at once, they are somewhat engaged now in trying to get the reciprocity bill through, and we shall have to discuss the wool bill on this matter. There is a good deal to be said on this bill, although the Senator may not think so. There is a good deal to be discussed, and we will discuss it on this motion. I am perfectly ready to do it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it will expedite either bill.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Virginia is in favor of the reciprocity measure, as I understand he is, I am astonished that he raises a proposition in this body now which will open a flood of discussion calculated to keep us here until the snow appears on the ground, thereby endangering and jeopardizing the measure for which this special session was primarily called. The proposition to attempt to report the wool bill or any other bill of that dimension while the reciprocity measure is before the Senate is rank absurdity and shallow demagogism, and I am too much——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I decline to yield any further.

Mr. PENROSE. All right.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator does not seem to be willing to confine himself to the courtesy——

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator's feelings have not been hurt by my endeavor to state the truth.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I decline to yield any further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield further.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me, if we are to have reciprocity in all other agricultural products besides wool with Canada, we might as well have reciprocity with our own people in wool; and therefore I am very anxious to have this wool bill voted upon about the same time that the reciprocity bill is voted upon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to say to the Senator that I think perhaps we would get along with just as much dispatch if the Committee on Finance will understand that the sooner they report the free list bill and this woolen bill, and these other bills, the sooner they will be able to get unanimous consent here to consider the reciprocity bill, because I, for one, in the frame of mind I am in now, will not consent to fixing a day to vote on the reciprocity bill, that singles out the American farmer, until some other proposition can be considered at the same time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, there seems to be a determination on the part of the Finance Committee to withhold from the Senate reports on matters of vital importance that have been referred to that committee to be considered and reported back to the Senate. If there had been any disposition shown by the Finance Committee to give prompt attention to these matters and to make prompt report to the Senate, I am very sure the Senator from Oklahoma would never have submitted the motion which he did submit.

The question has been asked several times on the floor of the Senate as to what course the Finance Committee contemplated pursuing in respect to these matters of vital importance to the entire country and not one word has been said to indicate that there was any purpose to report anything to the Senate except the reciprocity bill, which has been reported.

This talk about hearings impresses me as an indication of a purpose to delay. If there was any need of hearings, protracted hearings, I would be the last one to dissent from that course; but we had hearings on the Payne-Aldrich bill elaborate enough and comprehensive enough to elucidate these subjects, if they can be elucidated at all by hearings. Between now and the 10th of July there is ample time for any additional information which may have accumulated since the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration.

I believe that all this talk about hearings is simply an indication of a purpose to hinder and delay the progress of legislation on tariff questions, and I do not see that any discourtesy——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Virginia yield a moment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think that we ought to attach so very much importance anyhow to the question of hearings. There is a bill here framed as to every detail affecting one of the greatest industries of this country, that was put into Congress with all the prestige of the dictum from the presidential office without one moment of hearings, and I think there is no particular necessity of our being so very particular from this time on about hearings.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was going to suggest that there does not seem to be any great necessity of the Finance Committee spending a long time considering these tariff bills, because after we have waited for weeks for them to conclude their hearings we are unable to get any report or any recommendation from them. They simply report the bill here with no conclusions or no result of the deliberation connected with it. The sooner we get these bills here from that committee, it seems to me, the better.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I do not expect any valuable information to come to the Senate through the means of the hearings of which we hear so much. I do not believe any Senator on this floor expects to have any material benefit given from the hearings that we hear talked of so much. We all realize that this talk about hearings is simply an indication, as I have said, of a purpose to hinder and delay the progress of legislation on these subjects. I can understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not want this citadel of protection, as the woolen schedule is so often called, interfered with in any way, and so it is his purpose to hinder and impede and delay legislation in respect to the wool schedule.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia if my recollection is correct that the Payne bill was received from the House one day and reported to the Senate the next?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is my recollection.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My impression is that it was very early reported.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Within a few days.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There was a brief hearing, but my memory does not enable me to state the length of time. Some member of the committee, of course, will be able to answer that question.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Without any hearings it was reported back in a few days.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. PENROSE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Utah who addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. For the information of the Senator from Alabama, I refer him to the hearings in the House upon the woolen schedule in the Payne bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the Senate committee is concerned it had the bill under consideration for weeks before it passed the House or was reported to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I understand that the committee had hearings while the bill was considered in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we had no hearings while the bill was considered in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. My recollection is distinct on that point, that the passages of the Senate Office Building were filled up with woolen manufacturers in hearings upon the Payne-Aldrich bill while the bill was being considered in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I do not know what the Senator wants to infer as hearings, but I am sure that the Committee on Finance had no hearings while the Payne-Aldrich bill was being considered by the Senate, but did hear, informally, parties for weeks before it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. That is not what the Senator from Alabama alludes to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield to the Senator in a moment, when the Senator from Utah gets through.

Mr. SMOOT. I should have said the Republican members of the Finance Committee held informal hearings for weeks before the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Utah needs to refresh his memory. He will find statement after statement made while that bill was pending that they had not held any hearings. There were, as I recall, no notes taken of what was said. That the Republican members did confer frequently and fully with those interested in the preparation of the bill has been generally understood, and was avowed at that time. Of course, the Senator from Utah does not want to incorporate into the RECORD the statement that the Finance Committee held meetings.

Mr. SMOOT. I said it was the Republican members of the Finance Committee, the majority members, and that has always been the case in framing tariff bills. The Democratic Party, when in power, did the same thing, and a tariff bill was formed with the minority members excluded.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, I think that is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. While it is not permissible to refer to what transpires in the other body, I admit that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee framed the bill which passed the House yesterday. I make no complaint. I only rose to correct the statement of the Senator from Utah, which was that the Finance Committee had held meetings.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah, if his memory will enable him to answer the question, How long was it after the bill came from the House to the Senate before it was reported to the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. A very few days, Mr. President, as I remember; but it had been considered by the Republican members of the Finance Committee——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Can the Senator tell me how many days?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not state, because I do not remember exactly, but I will say within a few days. I simply say to the Senator that the Republican members of the Finance Committee held informal hearings for 12 hours a day for over two months before the bill was passed by the House.

Mr. CULBERSON and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from Utah is through, I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if it is the purpose of the Republican members to exclude the Democratic members from the hearings they purpose having on the wool schedule?

Mr. SMOOT. That question has never been discussed by the Finance Committee at this session, but I will say that in the framing of a tariff bill in the past, whether the Republican Party is in power or the Democratic Party is in power, the minority members of the Finance Committee have been excluded when the bill was being framed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the Senator from Utah is far from accurate in the statement which he has made.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Just let me get through, if you please. I do not think that it has ever been the custom in the Senate to use the methods of procedure which were used by the Republicans of this body pending the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Just let me get through, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is entirely reasonable and proper for the Members of the majority party to retire to themselves or to exclude the minority when they go into the consideration of any question, but never until the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill, according to my knowledge and information, has the majority of any committee proceeded with such hearings as were had by the Finance Committee in the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill. My former colleague made open protest many times upon the floor of the Senate, and a resolution was offered by him from his seat in the Senate protesting against the extraordinary and unprecedented course taken at that time by the majority members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call the Senator's attention to the very fact that his colleague had introduced such a resolution and it was discussed on the floor of the Senate time and again.

It was admitted here during that discussion that the Democratic tariff bill when it was formed was formed in the same way, and the Senator's colleague stated that whether it was or not he objected to the practice. It is exactly as the Senator from Texas says, as I have always understood it, and he agrees with me in the statement I have made.

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; I do not agree that it was ever the practice of either body to exclude the minority from the hearings. The practice was merely to exclude the minority when the majority came to propose, consider, and adopt amendments. My understanding was that you all claimed before that that you were not having hearings.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Texas, I wish to say that while we were considering and framing the tariff bill—that is, the Republican members of the Finance Committee—as the schedules were reached, there were parties interested for and against different schedules who were before the committee—not in the way of public hearings—but they were there to submit any information that they had or that they desired to give to the committee. The schedules were formed in that way.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has gotten about to the place where I started. They were secret hearings behind closed doors, from which——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Just let me get through or, if the Senator wants to elaborate his remarks into a speech, I will sit down, or if he wants to ask a question, I am ready to yield, or I am ready to yield for any reasonable and appropriate statement in reply to what I am saying, but not for a long speech.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator was saying they were secret hearings, and I thought he was through, and so I was going to——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not through. That is exactly what I was saying, that at that time the majority members of the Finance Committee repudiated the idea that they were hearings, and the charge made on the floor of the Senate by my former colleague and others was that hearings were being conducted; that parties were being examined; that their statements were being taken down in shorthand and typed up; and that the minority members of the committee, and the Members of the Senate generally, were not having the benefit of the information gathered by those members of the Finance Committee. I feel that we are entitled to see and to hear what takes place in the nature of hearings before a committee of the Senate. The Finance Committee is but an agency of the Senate; its members are not the masters of the Senate; and surely the Senate has a right to instruct its agencies.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Virginia will recall that two years ago the Finance Committee were the masters of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They usurped the power of masters, but I never recognized their right to act as the masters of the Senate then, and do not now. They are the agencies of the Senate, and they should respond to the will and pleasure of the Senate. If they could then report a House bill on two or three days' time for consideration, surely they ought to be able to report a House bill now between this time and the 10th day of July, especially when, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests, it is on the same subject in respect to which elaborate hearings have already been had in public as well as in secret by the majority members behind closed doors.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that the Senate may understand the conditions as they existed, I wish to state that the then chairman of the Committee on Finance reported to the Senate that there were no public hearings being held; that there was not a reporter in the committee room at any time when the bill was under consideration; but that the House hearings had been printed, that there were nine volumes of those hearings, and that the committee used the House hearings in connection with the consideration of the bill. The chairman of the committee so stated to the Senate; and there never was a time, I say again to the Senator from Virginia, when there was a shorthand reporter inside of the room of the Committee on Finance, and no testimony was reported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was not a Member of the Senate then, and I am inquiring for information. I understand that the Senator from Utah made the statement that there were no reporters allowed in the committee room. Then I understood him to make, some time before that, the statement that the Republican members did confer with the parties in interest or parties interested—parties who wanted to be heard.

Mr. SMOOT. Parties who desired to be heard for or against the schedule that was under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Then I understood the Senator from Utah a little bit after that last statement to which I have called his attention and a little bit before the first statement to which I have called his attention to state that these so-called conferences were not secret. How does he explain that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they were not made public any further than as to the men who were interested in giving the committee information. I do not know that you would call statements before any committee of the Senate public hearings unless the public could attend the committee meeting. Those informal hearings were held for statements to be made by parties interested, the same as happens often before other committees of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Were not the hearings, I will ask the Senator from Utah, upon the Canadian reciprocity bill public?

Mr. SMOOT. They were public hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Were they not taken down by stenographers and published every morning for the purpose of being made public?

Mr. SMOOT. They were.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then how can the Senator say that he does not know that any hearings before any committee could be called public?

Mr. SMOOT. We have hearings before committees of the Senate every day in the week, but they are not reported and taken down by a stenographer and are not public hearings. That is the character of the hearings which were held by the Republican members of the Finance Committee upon the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the Republican members.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, we all know that the procedure of the Republican members of the Finance Committee, pending the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill, was up to that time unprecedented; and we all know the controlling party is accustomed to having members of its committees get together and deliberate upon public measures and exclude from those deliberations the minority, but the course of the Finance Committee at the time referred to was unprecedented. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says, the hearings were not public. I say all the more was it subject to complaint when secret hearings were held for weeks, when a stream of people poured into the room of the Finance Committee from day to day and occupied the attention of that committee for a very long time; and yet the world was excluded from knowledge of what was going on in that committee room, and even the Senate was never allowed to learn the testimony that was given for the enlightenment of the committee. I feel that every Senator has as much right to enlightenment on a subject before a committee of the Senate as has the committee itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, which has just reported the wool schedule, held public hearings or did the public know what they were going to decide upon, and were the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House present when that schedule was formed?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I venture to say that there were no hearings had by the Ways and Means Committee of the other House behind closed doors when the minority party in the House was excluded from the room, but I will add, Mr. President, that I am not here to review the action of the House committee nor the action of the House. It is not within the province or jurisdiction of the Senate to arraign the other House or any committee of that House. I do not propose to go into a discussion of the procedure had before the House of Representatives or before any committee of the House, but I do have a right to raise my voice in respect to the procedure of a Senate committee, and I am simply exercising that right and expressing my views as to what the proper course is, and what should be done on this particular occasion by the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I called the Senator's attention to the matter or asked him the question was because he was stating that there was no precedent for the action taken by the Republican members of the Finance Committee two years ago.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have no doubt that statement was right in its broadest sense, and I made it in respect to the procedure in the Senate. I feel that there is no occasion whatever for delay about this matter. I do not believe that the Finance Committee contemplate having any hearings on the wool schedule with a view to gathering information and expediting the legislation which was referred to it for consideration with a view to having it expedited. I believe the Finance Committee is indisposed to lend its aid to this legislation as a committee of the Senate is expected to lend its aid to the Senate.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. BACON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and to whom?

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator from Oklahoma interrupted me first, and I will yield to him.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely rise to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that not only the Finance Committee submitted no record of testimony of any witnesses before them to the Senate, but they made no report to the Senate on the Payne-Aldrich bill. While it is true that the report of the hearings before the House committee was available to every Senator, it consisted of 8,000 pages of miscellaneous matter, given not under the proper safeguards of an oath.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And they are available yet.

Mr. OWEN. They are available now; but the then chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate confessed that he had not read those hearings in the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, there is ample time between this date and the 10th day of July for the Finance Committee to consider this matter and make a report to the Senate, if it desires to extend that aid to the Senate which the Senate has a right to expect from one of its committees. That is my deliberate judgment. For that reason I rose to express my approval of the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and to express the hope that it would meet with the favorable consideration of the Senate. I think the time has come——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia one question. He has suggested that we would probably elicit very little useful information if we had hearings before the Finance Committee on both of the bills which are still before it. Would the Senator from Virginia suggest that both of the bills be reported back to the Senate without any hearings on the part of the Senate committee—would that be agreeable to him—so that they might be discussed here at any time or at an early date, or does the Senator desire that there be some hearings had upon those bills?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am entirely willing to leave that to the Finance Committee, just so they make a report of some kind by the 10th day of July. For my part, I do not believe that any valuable information will be elicited from any hearings that may be given; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not desire to hear any of the evidence that may be adduced before that committee. I think we have had hearings ad nauseam. I believe we now have information enough at the command of the Senate to enable every Senator to reach a conclusion satisfactory to his own mind and just to all interests in this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I want to ask the Senator is this: Would the Senator and those whom he possibly represents, or those who have the same view as he, support a motion that both of these bills—the wool-schedule bill and the farmers' free-list bill, as it is called—be reported back immediately to the Senate, without any further testimony being taken by the Senate Committee on Finance?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I shall be glad to see them both reported at the earliest day the committee is willing to report them.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that was not the question. The question was whether the Senator would support a motion to report them back without taking any evidence?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will support a motion at an early day to discharge the committee from the further consideration of those bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would just as soon they would come before us now.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think it is the duty of that committee to give the Senate a report one way or the other, and I do not believe there is any occasion for elaborate hearings or for any extended consumption of time. If the committee want to have any hearings let them go about it promptly and expeditiously. Why have they not had hearings on the farmers' free-list bill during the several weeks that bill has been before them?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will state, first, that there have been some hearings upon the free-list bill, though a very few. We had a hearing one day on that bill. Second, as a member of the Finance Committee, I think probably I would favor the proposition suggested in the introductory talk of the Senator of reporting both of these bills back to the Senate without any further investigation by the Senate Finance Committee if the Senator would stand for a motion of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wanted to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the statement made by him, which, unqualified, might deceive the Senate or the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. How is that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator said that the Finance Committee had had some hearings upon the free-list bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. On one day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a matter of fact, what happened was this: While we were having hearings upon the reciprocity bill, some parties being here who desired to be heard later on upon these questions were permitted to be heard in the intervals of the other discussion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; but it was upon that bill.

Mr. LODGE. But we had a hearing upon that bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A number of boot and shoe men came here for that purpose, but there have been no formal hearings upon the free-list bill. They apprehended that at some time that matter would be before the Senate, and those parties, being here in Washington under some misapprehension, they were permitted to be heard then. I think that is a correct statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a correct statement; but that was a hearing upon the free-list bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I merely want to apologize to the Senate for my inaccuracy in stating the length of time that the Payne-Aldrich bill was in the Senate Committee on Finance. I said that my recollection was that it was there one day. I find upon referring to the RECORD that it was received from the House on April 10, 1909, and reported to the Senate on April 12, 1909. So the committee had it for two whole days.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I think two whole days would be amply sufficient for the consideration of the wool bill, because I do not believe there is any occasion for any elaborate hearings on that bill, and if the Senator from North Dakota is unwilling to wait until the 10th day of July for a report he might offer an amendment to the motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma. So far as I am concerned, I was willing to give until the 10th day of July, so that brief hearings could be had if the committee thought they were desirable. I myself do not think they are necessary, and I would be perfectly willing to see both the farmers' free-list bill and the wool-schedule bill reported forthwith from the Finance Committee to the Senate and without recommendation, for I have not the slightest idea we shall ever get a recommendation one way or the other in respect to either of those bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will excuse me, I can assure him that there will be one recommendation one way upon it, the same as there was upon the reciprocity bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator means the recommendation of one member of the committee. He does not mean to say that a majority of the committee will unite in a recommendation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean to say that there will be a member of the committee who will make a report of some kind on both of those bills.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. By the majority?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not speaking of the majority.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It would not be a report unless signed by a majority of the committee; otherwise, it would be merely the views of those who signed the report. I do not expect members of the Finance Committee to agree; I do not expect the members of the Finance Committee to give us any light by reason of hearings. I fear that we shall have all the delay interposed that the Finance Committee can interpose to prevent tariff legislation at this session of Congress. For that reason I am willing to unite with the Senator from Oklahoma in an appeal to the Senate to instruct its agency to proceed with the work confided to them, to do that work, and to make a report to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing, as a member of the Finance Committee and as a Member of the Senate, to vote to report both bills and put them on the calendar to-morrow.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That makes two Senators.

Mr. LODGE. Allow me to say that my only objection to that course is that it is as certain as anything can be that, if you put those two bills on the calendar with the reciprocity bill pending, we shall be here until next December talking about reciprocity. I want the reciprocity bill to get through, and I do not want to be held responsible for the inevitable delay that will come if you mix those three bills up together.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is exactly what I am complaining of. It is another evidence of the unwillingness to trust the people. Why should the Senator from Massachusetts think he is a safer man to deal with this subject than the Senate of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. It is not an unwillingness to trust the people——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If they choose to tie it up and they choose to delay reciprocity, is it not their prerogative to do so?

Mr. LODGE. It is not unwillingness to trust the people. I am speaking of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I meant the Members of the Senate. It is the same spirit——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator means the Members of the Senate——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The distrust of the people elsewhere seems to have gotten into the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts, and he is unwilling to trust his colleagues in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I am, as to expedition.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, perhaps the Senator has more wisdom than all the rest of the Senate; but at least there are some Senators who will not admit that, notwithstanding the high esteem in which he is held and the wisdom which he always manifests as a Senator on this floor. He is but one Senator. I say that the Senate, as such, or a majority of it, should have the privilege of dealing with bills which have come to it and which are referred to a committee for investigation and report.

Mr. LODGE. Personally, I have not the slightest objection, Mr. President, as I have said, to having those bills reported to the Senate. I should like to have the whole three bills here; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I would agree to vote on them to-morrow. I have not the slightest desire to delay the matter a moment. I only want to relieve myself personally from taking part in doing what I believe will delay the reciprocity bill very much indeed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator is only responsible for his own actions, and when he makes his report to the Senate he will exonerate himself of all responsibility.

Mr. LODGE. If Senators on the other side will take the responsibility of delaying the reciprocity bill, I have not a word to say.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We will meet such responsibilities as come. There is one responsibility that we are seeking, and it is the responsibility of dealing with the wool schedule. The Senator seems determined that we shall not exercise that responsibility, though it has been conferred upon us by the States that sent us to the Senate for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. All I want, Mr. President, is to put the responsibility of delay at the door where it belongs.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We accept the responsibility. Give us the bill, and we will take care of it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. DIXON. After the inability to get together on the part of the distinguished statesmen who have participated in the discussion a plan has occurred to me whereby we might get action on those bills immediately, without any regard to the Finance Committee. If you want to pass them in good faith, I would not limit action to the farmers' free-list bill nor the wool bill, because it strikes me that, after the passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill, if we are to have a "farmers' free-list bill," we might also have a "blacksmiths' free-list bill," a "lawyers' free-list bill," a "preachers' free-list bill," and probably 20 other kinds of "free-list bills."

Now, if the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Oklahoma are in such a hurry to get these bills out of the committee, I will say to them very frankly that, while I am a pretty good protectionist, if they will offer as amendments to the pending reciprocity bill the farmers' free-list bill, as you call it, and the other bills, I will vote for them.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from Montana can show the votes to carry those measures into law and will manifest a bona fide purpose of carrying them into law, I am ready to meet him——

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But if he wants these bills offered as amendments for the purpose of assassinating the reciprocity bill, I am not with him.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, there is no assassination in my mind.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] will have an opportunity to vote to attach the free-list bill to the reciprocity bill. I make no concealment that I intend to offer that bill as an amendment, as I did in the committee, and I would offer it if I knew it would defeat the reciprocity bill, because I want the sacrifice and the compensation of the farmer to go together. I want them both to carry or both to fail. But what I want to know from the Senator from Montana now is this: If after we have given an opportunity to vote to attach that amendment to the bill, if that fails, will he then help us to pass that bill as an independent proposition?

Mr. DIXON. The reciprocity bill?

Mr. BAILEY. No; the free-list bill.

Mr. DIXON. I have not examined the free-list bill. [Laughter.] The amusement comes a little bit early, for I want to say to the Senator from Texas and to my Republican colleagues—and we might as well have an understanding here now once for all—that I will reply to the Senator's question.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the Senator will, and I think I know he is going to say he will do it.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator is not far from the truth. I have always counted myself a pretty good protectionist. I voted for the Payne bill without any apology; it was not perfect, but I voted for it because I knew that no tariff bill that any American Congress ever could enact would be perfect, and because it seemed a comprehensive bill that covered all phases of American industry and American life. The whole theory of protection has appealed to me. I am not in favor of protecting the industries of Massachusetts and not the industries of Montana; I am not in favor of striking down the fishing industry of Gloucester and preserving the lemon industry in California.

It was this broad, national spirit of protection that made me a Republican. It was my belief in the principles of a protective tariff that caused me to cast my first ballot in North Carolina in 1888 for Gen. Harrison for President, running on a protection platform, and I have never varied nor wavered in my allegiance or belief in that policy from that time to this; but I want to say—and we need not have any diplomacy or misunderstanding about it—that when the Democratic membership of the Senate, aided by a few Republican Senators from States which have reaped great benefit from a protective tariff—seek to put the American farmer outside the pale of protection, as is sought to be done under this so-called Canadian reciprocity bill, they are driving a wedge that is as certain to destroy the protective principle as it is that the law of gravity will continue to operate. I will not be the first Republican Senator to strike the blow; I will not be actuated by revenge; but I do say that when Canadian reciprocity becomes a law—and I am addressing myself to the Senators, Republicans and Democrats alike, from Massachusetts and Rhode Island and Connecticut and Pennsylvania and New York and New Jersey, who by their votes are making it possible—there is no more question of what the inevitable result will be than there is that the Senate will adjourn to-night. We nead not cheat ourselves about the matter. You can not deprive the farmers of the West of their measure of protection for the products of their farms and stock ranges and at the same time expect to retain protection for your manufacturers. You shall not, by my vote, make fish of one industry and flesh of another, as is proposed in this misnamed reciprocity pact. We do not propose that the western farmer shall be relegated to a "Jim Crow" car while the eastern manufacturers continue to ride in Pullmans.

At the risk of wearying the Senate I will say that I received a letter in my mail this morning among many other letters, one to which I want the Republican Senators who are supporting reciprocity to listen. I will not read the name, but I will say to you that the man who wrote it is a Republican in my State, a farmer, a man of college education, and a man who knows conditions in that State as well as any man in it. He lives in the great Gallatin Valley, the richest grain valley in the world, not excepting the far-famed Valley of the Nile. The letter reads:

BOZEMAN, MONT., June 16, 1911.

I see by press reports that the opposition to the so-called reciprocity agreement by the farmers is not real; that it is being fostered by the "lumber interests," and so forth. Anyone making any such statement either does so willfully or has taken no pains to correctly inform himself of the true feeling of the farmers. The farmers of this valley are practically a unit in opposition, and we do not need any "ghost dances" or "medicine men" to agitate us either, as Jim Hill has stated. We understand why we do not want it just as well as he understands why he does want it, and it is simply a matter of dollars and cents. Under no circumstances can we be benefited by it.

The report that opposition is dying is not true as far as this part of the State is concerned; in fact, the opposition is stronger than it ever was. The farmer is the joke again, as usual. We are not free traders, but we will be with a little more legislation like that proposed.

Very respectfully,

——— ———.

I want to say to Senators, Republican and Democrat—those of them from New England and New York and Pennsylvania and the others who have lived in the citadel of protection—that that letter I think truthfully reflects the feelings of the farmers of this country to-day——

Mr. GALLINGER. We are getting scores of them from every State.

Mr. DIXON. The men who have given the Republican Party its majorities for the past 40 years. Do not be mistaken, gentlemen. Whenever you deliberately, under whatever pressure, whether from the other end of the Avenue or from the newspapers of your State, who hope to be financially benefited by the "free print-paper" clause, agree and consent to destroy the measure of protection that the farmers of this country have enjoyed, that minute the death knell of protective tariff is rung, and no sophistry of argument, no temporary state of public opinion in your States, and no newspaper editorials are going to save the very thing which I now prophesy from becoming a certainty. It may not last; the probabilities are that the American people after one dose, such as we had from 1893 to 1897, may again recover from the emetic which they will take, commencing with this Canadian reciprocity and winding up with free wool and free everything else. It may bring us to our senses.

You who are supporting this so-called reciprocity scheme talk about being the friend of the farmer! You have already prepared to crucify him on the cross of Canadian reciprocity. And now you Democratic Senators want to put wool on the free list to demonstrate your abiding affection for him.

Mr. BAILEY. There are not 3 votes on this side of the Chamber to do that.

Mr. DIXON. I am glad to know that; but your 20 per cent ad valorem means about the same thing. The bill, as it passed the House, will bankrupt every woolgrower in the West. While it is not quite as bad as the wool bill of 1893, the sheep man will, under its provisions, slowly but surely be put out of business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator from Montana will not ask to proceed with an elaborate statement.

Mr. DIXON. Just wait. I want to answer the question of the Senator from Texas. Then I will finish.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say, do not come in here with popgun revision of the wool schedule and a fake farmers' free list. If the Canadian reciprocity bill passes—and it looks as if it is going to—and we destroy the principle of protection, let us not leave Washington with only one corner of the temple torn down. It presents a bad, a mutilated effect. Let us go through the whole list, and out of the ruins which will come, after the American people have taken a new survey of conditions, we may be able to again construct a comprehensive system of protective tariff that will deal justly with all forms of American industry—manufacturer, farmer, and miner alike—one that will be equitable to all classes and all sections of our common country.

Now, answering the Senator from Texas, when reciprocity passes, if it does, I am ready to start revising the tariff, and it will not be confined to the wool schedule and the farmers' free list. I am ready to take the whole thing from A to Z, and so far as I am concerned, I am ready to give it a revision that will not be a homeopathic one.

Now, I have answered the Senator from Texas, evidently to his satisfaction.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Senator the direct, specific, and simple question if the free-list bill, when offered as an amendment to the reciprocity bill, is rejected, will he then vote for it as an independent proposition? I am afraid he talked himself out of a disposition to do so.

Mr. DIXON. No. I want to be frank. To tell you the truth I have not seen the free-list bill. I understand it only as I have read the newspaper headlines. I am not here to say that I shall vote for anything in it, because I do not know what is in it. I want to inquire if shoes and the products of leather are on it?

Mr. BAILEY. They are.

Mr. DIXON. Then, I will say to the Senator from Texas, with a great deal of pleasure I will support that.

Mr. BAILEY. And agricultural implements.

Mr. DIXON. Agricultural implements?

Mr. BAILEY. Of all kinds.

Mr. DIXON. And cotton goods and free rice and almost everything else.

Mr. BAILEY. No. [Laughter.] We cut out everything, I will say to the Senator from Montana——

Mr. LODGE. There is no movement for free rice.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Montana, that in the amendment, which I offered in the committee, I eliminated all the products of the farm and made it——

Mr. DIXON. And mutton?

Mr. BAILEY. Eliminated that.

Mr. DIXON. Mutton and steers, I understand, are on it.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I eliminated everything that comes from the farm and confined it to the things that go to the farm.

Mr. DIXON. Well, I am——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator will vote for that, will he?

Mr. DIXON. I am in a state of mind——

Mr. BAILEY. "Almost persuaded." [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. I am waiting, preferring that the Senator should strike up that hymn again and postpone his question until reciprocity has become a law. I am going to vote——

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to press the Senator from Montana, because I believe he will vote for it.

Mr. DIXON. Do not have any fear about shoes and leather. I remember two years ago in this Chamber when the biggest humbug ever put up to the American people came up, when the shoe manufacturers and the tanners engaged in a joint propaganda to persuade the Congress to give them "free hides," and said that if we would give them "free hides" they would give the people "cheap shoes." I remember the little pink slips that the shoe drummers peddled all over my State, addressed to the Congressmen and Senators, "Please vote for free hides so that we may have cheap shoes." I saw the lobby of the shoe manufacturers and the tanners becloud the Senate Office Building that spring demanding "free hides" in the "interest of the people" of the United States, that they, the people, might have "free shoes."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator from Montana——

Mr. DIXON. Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber supported it, and a very few on this side did. We got "free hides." The people of the United States got left. Shoes and leather went up in price immediately. The result was that the farmers and cattlemen lost the 15 per cent duty on hides, the United States Government lost $2,000,000 in revenue, and the tanners and shoe manufacturers divided the profit.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Montana permit me?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Texas was broadgauged enough at that time to foresee what would happen, and he did not vote, under his idea of a revenue tariff, to deprive the farmer of the protection of 15 per cent on cattle.

Mr. BAILEY. And the Government of more than $2,000,000 of net revenue that it was getting.

Mr. DIXON. And he so prophesied at that time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment, until the Chair ascertains whether the Senator from Virginia will yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to have a few moments.

Mr. DIXON. I understand the Senator from New Jersey wants to ask me a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia claims the floor for himself. Other Senators are asking recognition. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. For a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to set myself right. The distinguished Senator from Texas——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The distinguished Senator from Texas says that there are not three men on this side of the Chamber who will vote for free wool. I do not know who those three men may be, but I want to say for myself I will vote for free wool with you, and I will vote for free sugar, too.

Mr. DIXON. Will you vote for free leather?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes, sir; I will vote for free leather.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has not yielded to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I know that the Senator from Montana thinks the farmers of the country have tired of the domination of the Republican Party.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has not yielded, and nobody has requested him to yield.

Mr. DIXON. But by his smile he invited an answer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He sees the handwriting on the wall; everybody else sees it there; and the line of cleavage between the old-line Republicans and the American farmer is a little more distinct than the line of cleavage between the Senator from Montana and many of his associates on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. DIXON. Let me answer.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will.

Mr. DIXON. No; the Senator from Virginia is only half right. The American farmer sees the entire Democratic membership, except two or three, arrayed against him on this question of reciprocity, while only a minority on this side of the Chamber will support the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator seems to forget that the originator of this movement is the President of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. I have some doubt about that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He has at least assumed responsibility for it. It would not have been here in the Senate except by his ipse dixit.

But there are, Mr. President, about 13, or around that neighborhood, Members of the Senate who have heretofore been loyal Republicans who now see this protective-tariff system carried to such an extent that they are in revolt against it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. DIXON. I am a protectionist, and I always have been.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not put you in that list. I thought the Senator was putting up a little establishment of his own, and that he had brimstone and was proposing to put some fire to it, and no doubt he will open a small shop before he gets through with it, if he proceeds on the line he has indicated here this afternoon.

Mr. DIXON. Just as big a one as I know how.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Montana need not be uneasy about a popgun performance. If we can get these 13 or these 11, as it may be, progressive Republicans to stand up with us for true and honest downward revision of the tariff we will give you a dreadnought broadside and not a popgun performance. We just want about a half dozen votes, and we will show you some tariff reform sure enough, and if you are earnest, just come up to the book, and we will go ahead with the performance.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Virginia yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Make your promise good. Let me suggest a way to you. If you are in good faith and not playing politics——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think I should be called upon to yield the floor to——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield further.

Mr. DIXON. Just offer a whole tariff bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. DIXON. He is yielding for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senator from Virginia says he is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How would you get it out of the Finance Committee?

Mr. DIXON. We will vote with you.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have digressed further than I intended. I did not contemplate occupying more than five minutes of the time of the Senate, and that was simply to endeavor to express the idea that the committees of the Senate are the servants and the agents of the Senate, and they should respond to the orders of the Senate. It is no discredit to a committee to be appealed to to do that for which it was created.

I want these bills that are before that committee reported out of that committee, and I do not care whether there is a recommendation one way or the other. I just want the Finance Committee to discharge its duty and make a report to the Senate one way or the other, and that was the motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma; and I believe that motion ought to prevail, and I hope it will.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill is not yet before the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma once or twice indicated a desire to speak when other Senators were on the floor. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to be recognized?

Mr. GORE. In a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not want to add anything to the economic information of the Senate right now, but I want to emphasize and try to carry down to history a piece of historical information, a thing that, at any rate, may be interesting to future generations.

The Republican Party has had a great many great leaders. I used to say that the Republican Party had been guilty of everything except stupidity. Blaine was a great leader; Thomas Reed was a great one. There are lots of them, and a great many of them gave to the country a great many keynote utterances that seemed to tickle the ears of the groundlings whether they made the judicious grieve or not; and a great many of them gave to the world some keynote utterances that were really worthy of recollection.

But it remained for this day of our Lord's grace for an elected leader of the Republican Party to utter the newest Republican note thus far uttered to an admiring universe. While the Senator from Virginia was talking, the Senator from New Hampshire interrupted him, and said that the people who were raising wool and the people who were manufacturing wool deserve some consideration. The Senator from Virginia replied by saying, "Yes; and the people who are wearing clothes deserve some consideration." Whereupon there came from the great well, the deep well of the intellect and economic ability of the present leader of the Republican Party this utterance: "It depends upon whether they wear clothes made out of American wool or not." The man who wears clothes deserves consideration, provided he wears clothes made out of American wool. That is the latest, the newest, the cleanest, the brightest, the wisest, and the deepest Republican utterance yet.

In the hearings before the Finance Committee I discovered a great many new Republican doctrines. Years ago the chief defense of the tariff was that the foreigner paid it, anyhow. They have quit that now. A little while before that the defense of the tariff was that you wanted to build up industries, protect infants until they could grow. They have quit that now; that is not bothering anybody. Then a little bit later on they took recourse in the assertion that protectionism was justified by the fact that they wanted to equalize the price of labor in foreign manufactories and in the manufactories of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And as they could not find any difference in the labor cost between Canada and the United States upon which to base their claim for protection with regard to the matters dealt with by the Canadian reciprocity agreement, they shifted their base again.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a minute, because this is so interesting. Then they wanted us to found a system of protection upon what, do you suppose? The comparative infertility of our land. Then they wanted us to found a system of protectionism upon what else, do you suppose? Upon the comparative greater nutritiousness of Canadian grass; and when we examined into that we found that the grass grew richer the farther you went north; and then when some of these people who were being heard were interrogated about the nutritiousness of Mexican grass, some of us being of the impression that going farther and farther and farther south the grass daily and daily losing more and more nutrition, by the time you got to Mexico it could not feed anything, we found that the Rio Grande was a sort of boundary which started a new process of nutrition in grass.

Then later on from the State of North Carolina, the State of my forebears, came a new basis for a system of protection. Hitherto they have argued that you ought to have protection because American labor was paid higher wages, but North Carolina lumbermen actually argued that they ought to have protection because, although their labor was paid half as much as the labor in Canada, it was so much less efficient that the cost of production had to be equalized. On the one hand, protection because labor is higher; on the other hand, protection because labor is less efficient.

Now, I will yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator has given a definition of the Republican Party's position on protection, its historic growth or evolution. Getting down to the modern Republican doctrine of protection, I believe it is to equalize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The cost of labor, I thought it was.

Mr. DIXON. To my great surprise the other day I was reading the Democratic Party's national platform——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yielded to the Senator merely——

Mr. DIXON. I want to call the Senator's attention to something more interesting than what he has recited. The Democratic platform on which Mr. Cleveland ran for President the second time said that party favored a tariff for revenue, with a view to equalizing conditions in the cost of the manufactured article abroad and at home, taking into consideration the difference in wages in the two countries. Now, I should like the Senator from Mississippi to differentiate between the Democratic Party's platform in Mr. Cleveland's time and the Republican position of to-day, for they are in almost identical words.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yielded for a question, and I prefaced my remarks this afternoon by saying that I did not rise for the purpose of adding to the fund of economic information. I was only calling attention to incidents of history that are very dear to me as a student of history and as a hero worshiper. I first rose for the purpose of worshiping the brand-new idea which sprang from the brain of the Senator from New Hampshire, and while I was about it I thought I would call the attention of the country to some comparatively new ideas that had been developed before the committee.

Now, I shall not undertake to expound the profound meaning of the Democratic tariff platform of 1888.

Mr. DIXON. It was practically on all fours with the Republican declaration of to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care to deflect here. I will say this much, however, to the Senator from Montana, that, in my opinion, there has never been any difference in principle between protectionism and so-called incidental protection.

Mr. DIXON. I agree with that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never in my life seen any difference. The principle is the same. They differ only in degree.

Now, Mr. President, our amiable friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, who generally keeps so quiet and intrudes himself so little upon public discussion, never was known, that I know of, to threaten anybody until to-day. But his threat carries with it no horrors, so far as I am concerned. He informs us that if we do not behave like good children we will be here until we see the snow on the ground. I want to inform the Senator from Pennsylvania that, so far as I am concerned, I, in the first place, wish I could see the snow on the ground to-day [laughter], but if I have to wait until in the due course of nature the snow falls, I, even I, will abide with thee from now until the snow falls, and from then till the buds come in the next spring, and from then on till the dog days in the next August, and from then on till the snow falls again in the following winter, and from then on till the trees begin to put forth their leafy buds on March 4, 1913, unless the Senate of the United States and the Finance Committee will give us a vote—we ask nothing else—upon the most salient and important measures which the Democratic House has passed—in its opinion, at any rate—in the interest of the people of the United States.

We do not ask you to vote our way; we simply ask you to go on the record; and we especially ask gentlemen from the West who have been cursing standpatters because the last campaign was waged upon a pledge and promise to revise the tariff downward by those who afterwards revised it upward, to sit with us until March 4, 1913, unless we can get these votes. He serves his party best who serves the people best. If you really do want to revise the tariff downward, stay with us until we do it—especially on Schedule K.

Oh, I remember well how, when I was sitting in the library of my plantation home in Mississippi, relegated for that two years to private life, I would get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read the utterances of that distinguished and eloquent and now deceased Senator from the great State of Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, as he tore to shreds this Schedule K, this woolen schedule; as he exposed its iniquities and its cheats and its pretenses and its oppressions; and I remember that the sitting Senator from the State of Iowa was not far behind him then. Has any change come over the spirit of his dreams? Has any change come over the dream of the apostle of protection himself, who, almost providentially, though accidentally, is approaching the Democratic Party by the position of the seat he occupies at any rate. Has any change come over the spirit of the dreams of the Senator from Kansas? Did you mean what you said then, or were you fulminating in the air? Do your people want these reductions of taxation? Is the popular force which was behind you then behind you now? Do you desire to serve them by doing their will as well as doing the thing that will subserve their interest? If you do, you need not bother with putting the wool bill upon the reciprocity bill as an amendment. If you do, and you wish to regenerate Schedule K and make out of the abnormality and monstrosity a clean child, even though it be a protectionist child, even though you do not reduce the duties down to where we Democrats would like to see them reduced, hold the Senate here; amend the House bill on Schedule K—the woolen schedule—as far as you can to suit yourselves, and help us to put it through.

I ask, Senators, do you contend that the Canadian reciprocity bill discriminates against the farmer; that it puts what he produces and sells upon the free list while it retains upon the heavily taxed list the things that he must buy?

Very well, then, after Canadian reciprocity is passed, let us compensate him by passing, not the free-list bill, but a free-list bill. If the House free-list bill will not suit you, go out and get together and offer here one in the interest of the farmers that will. Offer the various schedules and items of it as amendments to the House free-list bill, as it is brought up here for consideration. You may neglect to put some things on it that I would like to see there, but you will not put anything on it that I can not vote for.

Outside of this Chamber, are the people of the United States deserving of consideration, whether it happens that the clothes they may wear are made out of American wool or Australian wool; deserving consideration whether it happens that the hats they wear were made in Great Britain or made in New England; deserving consideration whether it happens that the shoes they wear were made in New England or made somewhere else? Here we are—gladiators in an arena fenced off by party lines. But the interests of the American people are a solidarity. Whatever their wishes and party affiliations may be, their interests are an independent thing, with which politics has nothing under the sun to do. Stay here until the snow falls. I am willing to stay here until the snow falls, and if a Democratic House serves a notice to that effect, I am willing to sign a paper with every Democratic Senator on this floor to the effect that we will abide with them until the wee small hours of the remote years.

I am willing and more than glad and I would be rejoiced to have my friend, who formerly served with me in the House, now one of the distinguished Members of this body, and all the gentlemen who have been giving the standpatters fits because they did not revise the tariff downwards, stay here with us and revise it downward, schedule by schedule, as the House gives us the opportunity, for it alone can originate revenue bills.

Mr. GRONNA rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi for whom, as he knows, I have the highest regard, that I am willing, I will say that I intend to vote for the motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma, but in connection with that I wish to ask the Senator a question. The Senator has referred to the progressives. Can the Senator from Mississippi name one single item that is now included in the reciprocity bill for which the progressives in the Senate or in the House gave a vote to have the tariff reduced upon?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg my friend's pardon; I did not hear him.

Mr. GRONNA. I asked the Senator this question: Can the Senator from Mississippi name one item that is now included in the reciprocity bill for which the progressives in the Senate or in the other body made a fight and in regard to which they contended that the tariff was too high.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Frankly, at this moment I can not, and still more frankly I would not desire to do it. I am not engaged now in cultivating differences between you. I am engaged in trying to find points of agreement and mutual cooperation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall be very much pleased, indeed, if we can not agree upon many things that will benefit the American people, that we shall agree to a few.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Evidently the Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me. I said to the Senator, and I only speak for myself——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. That I am willing to vote and ready to vote for the motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg my friend's pardon. I did not hear that much of his remark.

Mr. President, so far as this particular motion is concerned, why not let us deal honestly with one another and honestly with the people? It ought not to be a hard job. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that nobody expects the slightest enlightenment from any further hearings on the woolen schedule. If you will tell me when a so-called witness comes before the Finance Committee what business he is engaged in, where he comes from, and what political party he belongs to, I can write out his hearing beforehand. I say that from long experience on the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate. I have made this statement to several Republican Senators laughingly, and they have agreed with me that they could do the same thing.

What further light does the Senator from Pennsylvania want upon the woolen schedule? Bless my heart, if the light that met Saul on his way to Tarsus would come across his pathway, he would still vote for Schedule K, and he would still vote against the House woolen bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I am prepared to consider carefully a revision of Schedule K. It has been on the statute books for a long time. But the Tariff Board has the matter under investigation and will not report until December; and I feel that I ought to be permitted to pursue my own method of investigation. If I feel that I can give a more intelligent opinion upon the revision of the schedule after the report of the Tariff Board and not in the urgent manner suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, I hope he will allow for the infirmity of my judgment and give me an opportunity to have that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Thou, Paul, almost persuadest me."

Mr. PENROSE. One minute more. The committee is in receipt of a great many requests from Democrats and Republicans from all over the country requesting hearings on the woolen bill and the free-list bill; and if I recollect aright, the very lengthy hearing which we gave covering several days was to hear a number of gentlemen from Texas who were opposed to the free-list bill. I should like to be able to give people from all over the United States some opportunity at least to appear in Washington and record their views about these impending changes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not know the precise time it takes now to come from San Francisco to New York, but under the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma a man would have time to come from San Francisco to Washington twice and go back. Twenty days is no short time for hearings before a committee. The Senator from Pennsylvania can not create the impression upon the country that we are cutting off hearings. The motion is that the Finance Committee shall report back the bill on or before the 10th day of July, which is 20 days away—very nearly 3 weeks. That is the first proposition.

The next proposition is that if a Finance Committee at the last Congress could report to the Senate the woolen schedule of the present tariff law, after no public hearings of any description, but upon the information obtained by them from the House hearings and some secret conferences with interested parties, then those nine volumes of House hearings are still before the Finance Committee as the basis of information, and there is no way under the Constitution or under the laws of preventing them from having such secret conferences with parties interested now as they choose, and 20 days is a long enough time to have them in, it seems to me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Mississippi has honored me with a reference during his very eloquent address, I want to reassure him, together with all his associates upon that side of the Chamber, as well as all my political associates upon this side of the Chamber, that my opinions with respect to the tariff have not changed in two years. They have rather been emphasized and intensified. I expect that my votes during the remaining days of the present session will be entirely in harmony with the arguments I submitted and the votes I cast two years ago, but I now want to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator asks me the question let me express my gratification at what I have just heard and express the hope that there will be at least six of you, seven, let us say——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. To constitute a majority of one in this body, and then we can either carry through the House woolen bill or we may, in some respects, concede to one another and make it a little bit better and put it on the statute book so that the people who deserve no consideration, unless they happen to wear their clothes made out of wool raised in the right place, might not be——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have as little sympathy with that suggestion as has the Senator from Mississippi. I do not speak for any of my progressive associates. I would not venture to pledge them to any course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not ask you to do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only know what I intend to do. I now desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question: Does he believe that the reciprocity measure, so-called, if adopted, demands some compensation in behalf of the farmers whose products are put in free competition with Canada, and that such compensation should come in the form of either reduced duties or an enlarged free list in the general tariff?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in answer to the question just propounded by the Senator from Iowa, I will say that I do not believe that the Canadian reciprocity bill is of such a character as that it will injure the farmer and demand compensation; but I am willing to give the farmer what the Senator from Iowa chooses to call compensation and what I call justice; not as a matter of trade for Canadian reciprocity, but as lagniappe, as they say in New Orleans. They make a trade, and after it is made the merchant gives the child a stick of candy for lagniappe. I am willing to give it to the farmer because justice demands it, because Democratic principles and ideas demand it, because it is relief and not compensation.

But the motive that actuates me and the motive that actuates the Senator from Iowa have nothing to do with our walking along the same path toward the same end. It makes no difference if he calls the relief from taxation to the farmer compensation for what he considers a legislative injustice done by the reciprocity bill, and whether I consider it merely a right that he has, that God gave him, to be as little taxed as can be consonant with the necessities of Government revenue. We will not mind about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, I do mind. I believe it is the rankest injustice to so adjust our laws that the farmer will be compelled to sell everything that he produces in a free market and buy everything he buys in a market protected by duties upon manufactured products, for which there is no defense whatsoever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator and I shall not quarrel about that, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, then, here is, I fancy, however, the point at which we part. It is perfectly well known——

Mr. WILLIAMS. We were getting along so nicely. [Laughter.] I wish the Senator had not brought up that point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may be compelled, however, to sever these beautiful relations, for we must look the facts in the face. The Senator from Mississippi has announced, I think, heretofore his intention to vote against any amendment that may be proposed to the reciprocity measure. It is well known that those who favor this measure are in the majority here, a large majority, as I am told by those who have canvassed the votes of the Senate. Let us assume, therefore, that the reciprocity measure is passed; it is approved, and it becomes a part of the law of the United States. We pass the free-list measure. We readjust Schedule K. We enter into some of the iniquities of the metal schedule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the cotton schedule.

Mr. CUMMINS. And we try to destroy some of the privileges in the cotton schedule; but I fear that when they reach the Executive Department, by reason of the failure on our part to enjoy the information that will come from the Tariff Board, those bills will be vetoed and will therefore not become the law of the land.

If I understand the position of the Senator from Mississippi aright, in his zeal for lower duties, he will have put the farmer of the United States into free competition with Canada with respect to all that he produces, and he will have failed to relieve him of a single one of the high duties that burden the commodities which he must buy. There is the point of difference. I want the Senator from Mississippi to so unite these measures of relief that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. To so unite that we would kill the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That there shall be a disposition of all of them by the same vote in the same instrument.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there may be in the Senate a majority for a reformation of the woolen schedule; I think there is, if gentlemen who have hitherto poured out the vials of their wrath and their maledictions upon that schedule have not changed their opinion. There is, I know, a majority in favor of the Canadian reciprocity. But I also know that the lines cross and that there is not a majority in favor of the two tacked together, and everybody within the sound of my voice knows that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi further yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to correct the Senator from Mississippi here. I do not mean that he has made any misstatement, but to put my judgment against his own. I believe there is a majority in the Senate for a general and uniform reduction of the duties of the present law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it became a part of my self-appointed task to find out whether, if some of these measures were tacked upon the Canadian reciprocity measure, there would be votes enough, not to do the tacking—there would be plenty for that—but to make the tacked instrument a law later on. I did not lightly conclude that that majority could not be found, and I know that when I want two things, even though I can not get one of them, it would be stupid to throw away both.

Now, the difference between the Senator from Iowa and me upon the Canadian reciprocity consists in this, that he sincerely believes it will seriously injure the farmers of this country and I do not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi declines to yield for the present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want the Senator from Mississippi to——

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senator from Mississippi declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not want the Senator from Mississippi to understand that I believe in the somewhat hysterical statements which have occasionally been sent out for publication, that free trade with Canada in agricultural products will ruin or destroy the American farmer. I do believe, however, that it will result in some diminution in the prices of some agricultural products.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, so do I—a few things raised along the border that are affected by local trade conditions. That I thought was the difference between us. Whether it be the difference between us two or not, it is the difference between me and the men of whom I have selected you as a type. They believe that Canadian reciprocity will seriously injure the American farmer, and I do not believe one word of it. I remember when we had the Cuban reciprocity measure up in the House of Representatives—and I can refer to that House now, because it has passed into history—it affected southern agricultural products, sugar, rice, and all the things that our people raise. They became perfectly hysterical down there, and there moved down upon the Capitol, as the present President of the Senate will remember, a perfect army of beet-sugar raisers from the Northern States. It was said that beet sugar was going to be put out of existence by Cuban reciprocity; that Louisiana cane could never for a moment be grown again with a particle of profit. They knew it all. They knew it so well that there were tears in their voices while they told us about it. Their voices reminded me of the tone of the voice of my friend who sits just opposite me whenever he mentions Canadian reciprocity. I saw upon the floor of the House of Representatives one of the best friends I ever had, and one of the most intelligent men, and heard him while he stood and made a speech in which he scared himself out of his boots at the prospects of a half-naked and half-fed anemic Cuban; and, later on, when the Philippine free-trade bill came up, at the prospect of a half-naked, half-fed, and half-paid anemic Filipino with a water buffalo and a crooked stick running Louisiana out of the rice business, with her magnificently organized system. They even went so far as to tell us that all the rice our people would eat would come from the Philippines and from Cuba——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute until I finish this—would come from the Philippines and from Cuba; and as to that, when I replied to some of them, "But, my dear boy, the Filipinos have got to live, and they live on rice." "Oh, yes; but they will raise their rice and send it to us, and they will buy their rice from Canada." [Laughter.] In some of these hearings, I think, somebody was going to have the Canadians send us some of these things. The Canadians were going to sell us their lumber, while they bought lumber from Australia or somewhere just across the Pacific.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the Senator from Mississippi know that they are importing rice into the Philippine Islands, and were doing so at the time the so-called Philippine bill was pending here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I do, and that made the idea of being scared to death about the Philippine rice of greater insubstantiality to the people that were frightened about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi submit to another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the Senator from Mississippi changed his position on the wool question from the position which he occupied in 1894?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will tell me what position I occupied in 1894, I will tell him whether or not I have done so. [Laughter.] I belong to a class of organisms that grow. I do not know whether I have changed my position or not. Tell me what my position was then and I will answer the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator voted for free wool in 1894, as I remember.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I voted for the Wilson bill, and, by the way, I would prefer to have a slight revenue duty upon wool, as I would prefer to have a slight revenue duty upon all other things, but if I can not reduce taxes on any article except by putting it on the free list, I am going to put it on the free list if my vote will do it. If I can not relieve the consumer in keeping with the beautiful and symmetrical proportions of a tariff-for-revenue-only theory, I will relieve him anyhow whenever the chance comes and it is in my power to relieve him.

In answer to the Senator from Kansas I will say that I do not know that I have changed my opinion, but I am going to change my vote. I voted for free wool when it was upon the Wilson bill because it was there. That bill, in my opinion, was not then, as the Senator will remember, the abortion that it afterwards became when the Senate of the United States got through doctoring it; but on the Wilson bill I voted for free wool because it was upon the bill and the bill reduced taxes upon the people. I am going to vote for the House bill with a 20 per cent duty on wool for exactly the same reason.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator voted for the final passage of the Wilson bill, which contained a provision for free wool.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes, I did; and many a poor fellow traveling through the wilds of the banditti country in Italy has surrendered his purse thinking that it was better than to run the chance of losing his life. What has my vote for free wool got to do with this question? [Laughter.] I never was a hero in my life; I never sought the rear for safety; but I never sought the front for glory, and I am far from being a hero. Whenever I am half-starved and dying for a loaf of bread, and somebody comes along with a long knife and says, "I want half of that," and presents the knife, and half a loaf will do me good, I am going quietly to let him have half of the loaf and keep his knife, and I am going to eat the other half and thank God for that much. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. How if he wants all of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, my friend, the Senator from Montana does not belong to the progressives. He voted for the Payne-Aldrich bill. He will not join in this tirade against Schedule K, and yet he begins to see the error of his way. A moment ago I expected him to paraphrase the Scripture while the Senator from Texas was interrupting him, pleading with him, calling him up to the mourners' bench, and having an experience meeting with him. I expected him to say: Thou, Joe, almost persuadest me. I hope that before we are through somebody will have persuaded him completely——

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that he will be just as we are to-day, save these minorityship bonds.

Mr. DIXON. I did have a text of Scripture on my mind, but in the mêlée I forgot to quote it. The one that occurred to me when the Senator from Texas was on the floor, if I remember my Sunday-school lessons aright, was: "Unto everyone that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." I wanted to apply that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That idea failed to occur to the Senator, an old, life-long Republican, until it was suggested by something that was said by the Senator from Texas. I am astounded, because I had always looked upon the genial Senator from Montana as one of the most quick-witted of men, and how any man could have gone through a lifetime, beginning early, even in North Carolina voting the Republican ticket and advocating and standing for protectionism, without having remembered it not only as a quotation but as a creed, that part of the Scripture which says, "Unto everyone that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath," I can not understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate at this late hour for more than a few moments. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and I listened with interest to his criticism of a reply that I made in response to a remark made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I do not recall precisely my words. Possibly the Senator quoted them correctly; but if he did, it was an inadvertence on my part. My position is well known in reference to the doctrine of protection. As the Senator from Mississippi knows, it is as wide as it possibly can be from the position that he occupies.

The Senator has told us of some things that happened in the committee. I will not refer to them beyond saying that, if they are attentively perused, the fact will be developed that the Senator from Mississippi more than once gave us to understand that he was a practical free trader, and that he would not balk at putting almost any product on the free list if he had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if he can find anything that justifies that statement, I should like him to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I shall be able to find it; if not in express terms, then by implication at least. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi takes issue with me on the question of protection, and I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that, while we may not be as persuasive as he, while we may not be as erudite as he, or be able to entertain either the Senate or the galleries as well as he can, when this issue is drawn between the two political parties in the Senate or out of the Senate those of us who believe in the doctrine of protection will be quite ready to discuss that question. For myself, I regret that the issue has come in to-day to interrupt the consideration of the bill that we have been considering for so long a time.

I had no disposition, and have no disposition now, Mr. President, to delay a vote upon the so-called reciprocity measure. From my point of view it is not reciprocity at all, but it is here before us. The committee gave it careful consideration and listened patiently to men from the South, men from the North, men from the East, and men from the West, and it is now before this body for its deliberate consideration and action. For myself, I have no disposition to unduly delay it. I shall vote against it, but if in the wisdom of this great assembly it is thought best to put that measure on the statute book, I shall be content and trust to the future for my vindication.

Mr. President, I am against the bill that has come here from the other House dealing with the question of wool. We had an experience a few years ago which I think will be duplicated if that bill becomes a law. If this debate is to continue along tariff lines, I will take occasion in my own time and at my own convenience to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi and of the Senate to what happened to the woolen industry in the New England States under the Wilson Tariff Act of 1892.

I am in favor, Mr. President, of American labor and American industry. I prefer that employment be given to an American in preference to a man owing allegiance to any other country on the face of the earth. I am in favor of increasing the flocks of sheep in this country instead of decreasing them. I believe that by proper protection we can greatly increase our flocks of sheep and raise a much larger proportion of the wool that is being consumed by the American people to-day. I am in favor, Mr. President, of protecting the factories and the mills that are producing woolen goods in this country, because I prefer that labor at high wages be given to the people of America rather than to the people of any foreign country.

I do not know certainly, but I think I can turn to the record and show what our imports of wool and woolen goods have been of recent years. I find the figures, and here they are: In the year 1909 we imported over $18,000,000 worth of the manufactures of wool, and in that year we imported 290,000,000 pounds of foreign wool. If we can manufacture those goods in this country, and if we can raise that additional amount of wool in this country, then I prefer that those goods shall be manufactured here, and that that wool shall be raised in our own country rather than in Europe, in Australia, or in Argentina or any other country on the face of the earth. That is my position. I have no apologies to make; I have no qualifications to make in reference to the views that I hold on the great question of protection to American industries and American labor as heretofore advocated by the Republican Party.

Mr. President, I had not thought of saying a single word to-day. When the tariff question comes up for debate, as I presume it will later on, I may engage in the discussion, and I am willing to stay here with the Senator from Mississippi, for he is a most genial companion, and we all love him, nothwithstanding he is somewhat severe in his criticisms at times, as I think he was to-day in his observations concerning a remark that I made, in which I, perhaps, inadvertently used language that did not convey the meaning I intended—I am willing to stay with him here this summer and next winter and the next summer if need be.

Mr. WARREN. And so will we all.

Mr. GALLINGER. And so will we all, to fight out this question that divides the two great political parties of this country. If the people of this country have ordained that we shall sacrifice the agricultural interests of our people in a so-called reciprocity agreement with Canada; if the people of this country have ordained that the woolen manufacturing industry and the raising of sheep in this country shall be sacrificed, I am willing to take my share in the controversy, and to go down to defeat if a majority of the Senate should so vote. I will wait after that has occurred for what I believe will be a vindication of the position that I hold, and I will not find fault with any Senator or with any man in the United States who holds an opposite opinion to mine, because I think he has an equal right with me to hold firmly to the views he holds and to the conclusions which he has reached.

Now, Mr. President, I think that is all I care to say to-day. This discussion, perhaps, will be valuable, but for myself I would much prefer that this bill should take its usual course; that it should go to the Committee on Finance without instructions, and that we should continue the consideration of the bill which my friend from Mississippi is so anxious to have voted on, and which I have had no disposition whatever to delay. I am against the reciprocity agreement, but I believe it ought to be acted on by the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I only want to take enough time to bring the discussion, which has been most interesting, back to the question that is at issue.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has moved that this bill be referred to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report it back on the 10th day of July. Objection is made to that motion by the chairman of that committee in the polite, courteous, and senatorial phrase that the proposition is idiotic and demagogic.

It has been developed in this debate that this same committee, not composed of exactly the same members when the Payne-Aldrich bill was referred to it, excluded the Democrats from the hearings. I presume that exclusion was done in the interest of senatorial courtesy, but I pause long enough to make the remark that if it be true that a majority of the Finance Committee can exclude the minority of the Finance Committee from the hearings, gentlemen who indulge in those practices ought not to think it a serious reflection if a majority of the Senate venture to direct them as to the day they should report back to this body.

Moreover, it has been developed that these hearings were not only had in the absence of the Democratic members, but that certain gentlemen were admitted in secret, the press being excluded, and I say that if our Finance Committee proposes to adopt any such method we had better not refer this bill to that committee at all, and we had better keep the public business in a public hall where the people can know what is going on.

I should like to have a list, I should like to see the list published, of those secret hearings that they did not dare hold in the broad, open day, for I say that no man and no committee dealing with public business ever went behind locked doors to hear any evidence for a good purpose.

Mr. President, what is this proposition as it stands before us? The chairman of the committee has intimated, if I understand him correctly, that the Democratic members might again be excluded from that committee when the hearings or when the deliberations take place. I deny with all the emphasis of which I am capable, regardless of any precedent that may have been set either by the House or the Senate, that it is proper for a portion of a committee to meet for the purpose of determining the action of the committee.

The reason we have a committee is that we may have the consensus of opinion of the entire committee, and we have called here for the proposed action of the committee, and the nearest we have as an answer as to when that committee will report is the suggestion that the Tariff Board will not report until next December.

Now, if it be true that the committee proposes to follow its former precedent and the majority members of that committee are to consider and formulate a report, then we have a situation that was well described by the great Senator who sits on my right, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], when he pictured to the Senate the fact that 9 or 10 men could hold up the business of the Senate, that a small minority could hold up the business of the Senate by holding secret caucuses; and we not only have the secret caucus, but it is proposed or at least it has been introduced into the committee.

Here is a matter that concerns 90,000,000 people, and you propose that this body, representing all of the people, can not say to the nine Republican members of that committee—I apologize to the Senator for counting him almost as one of them in this illustration—that they can not tie it up indefinitely. I say, if there is any danger of this kind, this body ought to instruct the Finance Committee every time it commits anything to it.

You talk to me about senatorial courtesy. You say it is a reflection on the committee for the Senate to instruct it to report back at a certain time, and then the committee says that they will not—the majority—that they have the right to exclude the minority. Then they not only have the right to exclude the minority from a chance to participate in the deliberations, but they have the chance and the opportunity to exclude the Senate from the consideration of that proposition and to throttle a measure that affects the welfare of the American Republic.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I say that that kind of senatorial courtesy is dead and buried in the Senate. It will be discovered that there are men on this floor who may be young and inexperienced, but who have had sufficient experience to understand what that kind of method leads to in the country.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator yield, that I may make plain the position, as I understand it, of the Finance Committee?

Of course, the hearings would be attended not only by the full committee, but would be open to reporters and to the public. It was only in the framing of the bill two years ago that the Republican members met apart from the minority members, and the hearings held by the Finance Committee two years ago were informal hearings, and, as I recollect, in no case was even a stenographer present to take down the testimony. It was merely the testimony, advice, and information of persons familiar with the various schedules who were sent for by the committee, the House Committee on Ways and Means having early in the winter, before the organization of Congress, conducted over a period of several months exhaustive hearings on the bill which was to be introduced in the approaching Congress. There was no mystery about the proceedings, and no secrecy. The hearings on the reciprocity bill were attended by the full committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the press.

Mr. PENROSE. And the reporters of the newspapers were present, as were stenographers, and the hearings are published and before every Senator.

I ought to say, if the Senator will permit me for one moment, that two years ago, immediately upon the call of the extra session, the then chairman of the Finance Committee gathered together the members of the committee, although the committee was not then complete, as the Senate had not organized its committees, and prior to the 4th of March the Finance Committee of the Senate began its sittings and continued its sittings daily for several months, during which the bill was pending in the House of Representatives, anticipating the measure coming to the Senate and with the desire to expedite the work, to pass the bill, and quiet the business disturbances caused by the prolonged discussion.

Mr. REED. That is the trouble with the whole matter. The hearings were quite too informal and quite too secret.

Now, I do not understand the position of my friends on the other side. A moment ago, when it was being urged that we needed a long time to take evidence and to consider this bill, we were told that the committee in considering the Payne-Aldrich bill had sat for a long time and had had hearings, and that was used as a justification for the quick passage of that bill. But now we are told by the Senator they were informal hearings; that only experts of some kind came before that committee; that evidence was not taken. So that either one or the other of these positions must be true, either the Payne-Aldrich bill was passed without any real hearing, without any real evidence, without giving the public a chance to be heard, and therefore it might well be used as a precedent here for a short hearing, or else they did have hearings; and if they did have hearings, then they were secret hearings from which the press was excluded, and from which the Senate was excluded, and the benefit of which neither the minority of the committee nor the Senate ever received.

Mr. PENROSE. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri, in all fairness and all seriousness, to the radical difference between the situation at this Congress and two years ago. Two years ago the House of Representatives held prolonged and exhaustive hearings, and it would have been unwarranted delay and unnecessary labor for the Senate committee to have indulged in a repetition of those hearings from the same persons who appeared before the House committee; but in this Congress, as far as the record shows, no opportunity has been given to be heard to the hundreds and thousands of persons asking for hearings, and the situation is reversed. It would seem as if it was almost the duty of this great deliberative body to give an opportunity to be heard in view of the fact that no hearings, apparently, were granted by the House.

Mr. REED. The hearings that were had before the House that went exhaustively into every one of these questions are as available now as they were when the committee reported back the Payne-Aldrich bill after two days consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. The proposition is different.

Mr. REED. And every fundamental fact that was brought out with relation to production and consumption and the cost of production is as true to-day as it was then, with the slight fluctuations in the market; and in 20 days' time any committee that means business, that wants to report this bill back, can gather every fact of that kind that it desires to gather, and they can not only get the evidence, but they can get more evidence than will ever be read by this body, and if they proceed as that committee has proceeded on the subject of reciprocity, and at the end of the time the majority of the committee are unable to lay before this body its views or its suggestions, I want to know what benefit we will get from its prolonged consideration of this subject.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. One moment. The truth is, and every Senator here must recognize it, that there is an indisposition to report back to the Senate the bill known as farmers' free-list bill, and the Senate ought to make sure before it sends anything to that committee that they will report it back. I say again, and then I will yield to the Senator from California, that I have nothing but profound contempt for that kind of senatorial courtesy which would prevent the Senate from saying when its committee shall report back, when that committee has in the past, and it does not yet disclaim its purpose for the future, excluded a portion of its own members from the deliberation of public matters that were consigned to its keeping.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he believes that the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma was made in good faith to hasten action upon this bill?

Mr. REED. I so believe.

Mr. WORKS. If so, I think some of us on this side of the Chamber are willing to vote for the motion upon that theory. But if the other side is going to take the great part of the time in speechmaking I am afraid we are going to change our minds, because it is devoted to a discussion of the tariff question generally and the conduct of the Finance Committee; and that has no bearing upon the question which is before the Senate. I am one of those who believe that the business of the Senate should be hastened, and I think this is a good time to commence.

Mr. REED. The Senator from California will bear me out in the statement that I have not been discussing the tariff. I have tried to discuss the necessity of the Senate keeping its hand upon its own business and of seeing that this matter is reported back.

I want to assure the Senator from California that this motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma was made in good faith in the hope to expedite this business and in the hope that the Senate might have before it these important measures at an early date.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill came from the House of Representatives to-day, and I doubt very much whether it is in the hands of the Finance Committee, and before it is received by the committee a motion is made that we are to make a report upon it on the 10th day of July.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that the business of the Senate is always in its own hands.

The Senator made a statement that the committee had excluded certain Members from its hearings, and inferred as much as that it could exclude the whole Senate from the consideration of any question. The Senator must know that under the rules of the Senate the Senate can discharge a committee at any time when a majority of the Senate wishes it so. So there is no need of any haste here at all. If the committee does not report the bill in time, after a due length of time has been given to it, any Member of the Senate can move to discharge the committee from its further consideration, and if there is a majority of the Senate in the same frame of mind it can take the bill away from the committee and bring it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for suggesting to me that the Senate can discharge a committee. I have not been here very long, but I was quite aware of that fact.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I——

Mr. REED. But if we were to undertake to do it we would again be confronted with the ghost of senatorial courtesy, and we would be told we were abusing the committee.

Now, I submit that outside of this body it is the universal and uniform custom, at least on occasions, to fix times for committees to report back. We are giving 20 days, and that is enough. That is all I want to say about the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, all of the arguments upon the other side to-day have suggested and have been based upon the presumption that any evidence which will be produced by the committee will be of no value to the Senate, and I am in perfect accord with that suggestion. We have spent six weeks in taking testimony upon the reciprocity agreement. All of the evidence taken was practically on one side. All of the evidence was against the reciprocity agreement. There was a little talk in its favor, but there was no evidential fact before the committee which could be said in any way to favor the reciprocity agreement, and notwithstanding the volumes of testimony, notwithstanding their evidential value, we will not be able to change a single vote in the Senate of the United States.

If that is true upon the reciprocity agreement, I think I am justified in saying and in agreeing with the Senators on the other side that it will be equally true with reference to any testimony that may be secured by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. President, I have not talked with my associates upon that committee as to whether or not they wish to investigate the subjects any further. I am inclined myself to agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that the evidence which was taken two years ago is perhaps pretty good evidence to-day; that there has been very little change in conditions such as to make that evidence valueless; and if that evidence was sufficient for us to base general tariff legislation upon, I am inclined to think that it is sufficient for us to-day.

Being a member of the Committee on Finance and not having discussed the question with my associates, I am hardly in a position to father a motion that the bill be printed and lie on the table for future action without reference to the committee. But if the argument of the Senators on the other side is correct, I am willing that any one of them should make that motion, and I am perfectly willing on my own part to relieve myself of the necessity of many long days of investigation of that subject. I would support a motion to print the bill and allow it to lie on the table without any reference whatever.

But I do think, Mr. President, that if we go into the subject, if we are compelled to investigate it anew, it is not proper to-day to fix the day on which we shall report it back, inasmuch as that request can be made at any time. The Senate Committee on Finance may show that it is not at all dilatory in its action, and I for one will not favor any dilatory tactics whatever. I am willing to get through with this evidence as soon as possible. It seems to me that then we should wait until we find what the committee is going to do. If the committee goes at this matter in too leisurely a style and shows a disinclination to hurry it, then I think it would be time enough for the Senate to call it to account and ask it to report the bill back at a time fixed.

But if Senators on the other side wish to have this matter before the Senate to-day without any further investigation, I am with them and will vote with them upon a motion of that kind. On the other hand, I can not support this motion that will to-day fix a time, if we are going to investigate it at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am quite willing to vote upon this question now. The Senate has been in session something over six hours, and there does not seem to be any indication that this debate is to end in any reasonable time. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he is not willing that we should now take an adjournment?

Mr. CULBERSON. We are unable to hear the request of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Inasmuch as the indications are that this debate is to continue for some time, and nothing is to be gained by remaining in session any longer, I suggested to the Senator from Oklahoma that we might take an adjournment.

Mr. SHIVELY. It will not take any longer to take a vote on the motion to refer with instructions than on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If we could take the vote, that is quite true; but there is no indication that we will be able to do it.

Mr. GORE. I think we had better proceed now, if possible, to vote. I will not be willing now to have it go over.

Mr. GALLINGER (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, if it is determined by a majority of the Senate that this discussion shall proceed, I will have no objection; but the only way to determine that is upon a vote, and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama (when the name of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was called). The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Observing my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and will withhold my vote. If I were privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. As he is absent, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was unexpectedly called out of town night before last on an important matter. He has not yet returned.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRADLEY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to announce the pair of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], which the Senator from Kansas has just stated.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair on political matters with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I understood from other Senators that a motion to adjourn is not considered a political matter. On the next vote to be called, the vote on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma, I intend to vote, if I vote at all, "nay," because I think the Senator from Connecticut will vote the same way, and my pair would not hold. Therefore I considered my vote on the matter of adjournment immaterial. However, as my vote is in a measure challenged, I will withdraw my vote on the motion to adjourn, and not vote.

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. TERRELL], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 35, as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is not only the question of the immediate disposition of this bill involved but there is involved a principle that it seems to me should appeal to Senators. Only two years ago the people of the United States through their Congress enacted a law covering this schedule. It was after the people had been heard fully. It was after the people had had an opportunity of being heard before both Houses of Congress. The people, responding to the opportunity given them to present themselves and the facts upon which they based their conclusions, appeared before Congress and were heard at great length. As a consequence of that hearing Congress in its wisdom enacted the present law. It has only just gone into effect.

Now, it is proposed within a few months to disregard the wishes of the people who were heard before the committee, and to repeal the legislation of Congress that was enacted in response to the demand of those who appeared. That is the question presented by this bill.

The measure comes to us in the ordinary course of legislation from the House. It receives three days' consideration in the committee of that body. It was introduced on the 2d of June, reported on the 6th, and one of the intervening days was a Sunday. We have no suggestion that the people whose interests are involved in this legislation have changed their mind or that any new condition of facts than those upon which the last Congress acted have arisen. Presumably the facts are the same, and it naturally follows that the wisdom of the legislation rests upon those facts.

We are asked to change our conclusion of the last Congress without any additional facts upon which to base that change. Under the ordinary procedure of the Senate an opportunity to present the new facts upon which to urge new conclusions would be afforded before the Senate's Committee on Finance, having charge of this measure. It is obvious that this opportunity should be afforded the people. It does not seem to me to be fair that the verdict of the last Congress should be set aside without some reasons being given for such action. It is true that in the period suggested of 20 days some facts might be ascertained. It is equally true that because of the size of this country geographically those facts could not reach the committee during that time except to a very limited extent. It is equally true that the people whose interests will be affected by this proposed legislation are entitled to be heard. It is braggart legislation that is forced through under such circumstances by those who are continually fretting the air with their assertions of devotion to the will of the people. They clamor for the echo of the voice of the people—that is, they do in public—and when the responsible hour comes to test their sincerity, they deny the public the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. President, I was not willing, and I am not now willing, that this matter should be disposed of without making a record that the people can read, whether they hear it or not. This is a proposed repudiation of the express judgment of the last Congress, which terminated only on the 4th of March last. We are asked to assume that it is true that the people between the 4th of March of this year and this day have changed their minds and that the facts and conditions which were the basis of existing legislation have also changed. It is sought to deny us the opportunity of ascertaining whether or not this is true. I think it will hardly commend itself to the people of the country that Congress is willing to act in an irresponsible way by asserting in one hour that the judgment of a Congress that was the result of months of consideration is no longer to be commended or sustained.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	La Follette	Root
Bailey	Dillingham	Lippitt	Shively
Bourne	Dixon	Lodge	Simmons

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber by his own illness and by illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have no greater interest in this matter than another Senator, and it is not my intention to undertake to prolong the consideration of this question until to-morrow's session. I am sincere in my belief that the people to be affected by this legislation should have an opportunity of being heard in one body or the other. Had hearings been held where the bill was introduced, then we might have availed ourselves of the facts, which must be stupendous in themselves to justify the repeal of legislation which has been in effect only a year.

Some great revolution must have occurred in the industrial world to make it wise or necessary to change a law enacted less than two years ago, and, as a member of the Committee on Finance, I want to know what it is. I want to know what new conditions have arisen that demand even the consideration of the revision or repeal of that law, so recently enacted. I, for one, want to hear some testimony or statement from some responsible source as to why that law should be repealed or modified; I want to hear some facts upon which to challenge the wisdom of the Sixty-first Congress, and I want them to be heard in the usual manner in which such things are brought before the Senate.

The Committee on Finance is empowered, under the standing rules that govern this body, to inquire into the necessity and wisdom of certain legislation proposed to be enacted. Some Member arises in his place and asks that that committee shall be limited and directed and controlled before the bill is read in this House, before the measure is even before the Senate, so that Members may know what is proposed in the way of legislation, and before it is referred to the committee at all. It can not be that it is with the suggested alternative that, unless this committee will abrogate its office or promise itself not to perform its duty, the measure will not be referred to it at all.

There is no Member of the Senate and no member of that committee who could form any intelligent and honest judgment as to the length of time necessary to develop before that committee such facts as would justify it or justify the Senate in reversing the action of the Sixty-first Congress. It is sensational in the highest degree to propose that a standing committee of this body shall perform its duty at the dictation of anyone, when that duty must represent the conscience of the committee.

We have no cloture rule in the Senate, yet you propose to establish one for the committee before a single circumstance has developed that would indicate the necessity for so doing. What is it that prompts Senators to anticipate failure in the performance of duty by a committee of this body? It is difficult to choose words within parliamentary rules to describe it. It is not senatorial; it is not parliamentary; it is not fair merely because a Senator is in favor of a measure to trample down every rule of propriety in order to rush it through, regardless of what is fair.

If it were possible to break down this great Government of ours, I can think of no procedure more apt to bring it about. What confidence will the people have in legislation if it shall be based upon a refusal to listen to the voice of the people when they are entitled to be heard? They have recently spoken through their Representatives in Congress upon this question. Congress has recorded the will of the people in the legislation that was enacted. Talk about sensational proceedings, this motion is as sensational as you might expect to hear in a socialistic convention. It is not befitting the dignity, it is not befitting the conservatism that should mark the proceedings of the Senate of the United States. Its purpose is to ride over the established order of procedure in this body, to disregard it. It is the kind of sentiment that should have no place in the Senate.

We have not undertaken to attack any other committee of this body in this way. If a committee shows a disinclination to perform its duty, then bring it before the Senate, because the committee is comprised of Senators equal in every respect with those who are not on the committee. To do this on party lines is less creditable. I am speaking in the aggregate now. It is not a creditable performance that either party in the Senate shall undertake to say to a standing committee, "You shall not exercise a conscientious judgment in this matter; you will jump to the snap of the whip, and you will come in with your report when we tell you to, and you will report as we tell you to." That will be the next thing. Some Senator may rise in his seat and offer a resolution that the committee be authorized and instructed to report favorably or unfavorably on a measure before it. One might be done with as much propriety as the other.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JONES. I think we ought to have a quorum present.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have nothing to do with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington raises the question of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Bryan	Culberson	Fletcher
Bailey	Burnham	Cullom	Foster
Bourne	Chamberlain	Cummins	Gallinger
Bradley	Clapp	Dillingham	Gamble
Bristow	Clark, Wyo.	Dixon	Gore
Brown	Crane	du Pont	Gronna
Heyburn	Lodge	Overman	Smoot
Hitchcock	Lorimer	Penrose	Sutherland
Johnston, Ala.	McCumber	Perkins	Swanson
Jones	Martin, Va.	Pomerene	Warren
Kenyon	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Watson
Kern	Myers	Simmons	Wetmore
La Follette	Nelson	Smith, Md.	Williams
Lippitt	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. My colleague [Mr. PAGE] was obliged to leave the Chamber on account of indisposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to prolong this debate. There should be no occasion to speak at all. The country is under the impression that it has a Republican Senate. The people are entitled to believe that the Senate of the United States is Republican by majority. So that this question having been made a party question by the other side, should safely go to a vote with the assurance that the Republican Party would prevail. The vote that is cast on this question of protection or the manner of legislating upon this question of protection will show the people of the country whether or not the Senate is Republican. Unless the vote is against this motion, the people may have been mistaken.

Republicans vote together on tariff questions. When it is a question of the consideration of tariff questions, while they differ in regard to details in the making up of tariff measures, when the question is, Shall the tariff be considered from the Republican standpoint? Republicans vote for it, Democrats vote against it; and I shall watch the result of this vote with interest—and the country will—to see whether or not the Republican Party has a majority in the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator mean that he will watch the vote on the so-called Canadian tariff bill for that purpose?

Mr. HEYBURN. I mean exactly what I said. I will watch the vote on this question, which is whether or not this tariff measure shall be considered along Republican lines or along Democratic lines. That is the vote I will watch. And if the Senator means to anticipate the vote on the Canadian tariff bill, I will say to him that he will not have the opportunity of seeing me walk out of the Republican Party at this or any other time.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. The bill comes from a President elected as a Republican; it passed the House against a majority of the Republican vote of that House; and I should like to know the Senator's analysis of its Republicanism.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill came from a Democratic House, and I want to know whether or not a Democratic Senate is going to determine its destiny.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. There will be no majority of Republicans in favor of this Democratic measure. I can assure the Senator of that fact.

Mr. CLAPP. And I can assure the Senator that that bill can never pass the Senate without Republican votes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, there are a good many measures——

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That have passed the Senate which should not, that passed it with the aid of Republican votes.

Mr. CLAPP. Never as vicious a one as this, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am prepared to vote at this time on the tariff bill revising the duties on wools and woolens, which passed the House of Representatives on yesterday and was received by the Senate to-day. I believe that every Senator is ready to record his vote upon this bill. The Congress that framed the Payne-Aldrich law took the testimony of some 250 witnesses on wool and woolens as affected by Schedule K of the tariff law, and printed the evidence in a volume of nearly 800 pages. That testimony is accessible to every Senator. We need waste no further time with hearings. The country wants legislation on this subject. It has had enough of hearings. It wants action. If the Committee on Finance were to examine witnesses for months and print volumes of testimony it would not change the opinion of a member of the Finance Committee or a Senator upon this floor.

It has been asserted in the course of the debate upon this resolution that the vote will determine whether there is a Republican majority in the Senate. I do not permit any Senator to question my Republicanism because I do not happen to agree with that Senator upon some phase of the tariff question. I defined my views regarding Schedule K two years ago when the tariff bill was pending before this body. At that time I analyzed that schedule, presented a series of amendments to revise it upon a basis which I believed to be, and, I think, demonstrated to be, strictly in accord with the Republican platform of 1908. There are no changed conditions, Mr. President, which would lead me to a different conclusion upon that schedule. Every Senator here knows full well that nothing has transpired which would lead any Senator to a change of attitude regarding the tariff on wool and woolens within the last two years.

The fact that I do not agree with some Republican Members of the Senate who are opposed to any changes in the duties in Schedule K warrants no challenge of my good faith in any respect, and I resent it here and now. No Senator here has the right or power to determine my political status or my political standing.

I regret the course, in one respect, which this discussion has taken this afternoon. It is becoming quite the fashion recently, first upon the Democratic and then upon the Republican side of the Senate, to arraign and assail the progressive Republicans. I do not believe it serves any good purpose to indulge in that sort of political practice upon either side of this Chamber. There are a few Members of this body who are progressive Republicans. They have certain convictions, and they will support and defend their convictions regardless of the taunts and innuendoes and baitings from either side of this Chamber. They will stand, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi, on the tariff question, now and hereafter, just where they stood when the Payne-Aldrich bill was before the Senate, and they do not need to be catechised by anybody. They have never swerved one hair's breadth, Mr. President, from the course which they have marked out for themselves, nor will they.

Now, then, it was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that he would not stand for any amendment of the President's reciprocity pact as formulated in the pending bill, because he had taken some pains—I do not undertake to quote exactly his language—to ascertain that if it were amended it could not become a law. I took that to mean, and I can not interpret it in any other way, that he has been informed by the Executive that if the so-called reciprocity bill is amended it will be vetoed.

Mr. SMOOT, Mr. CLAPP, and others. Ask him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No. If he desires to make plainer what he said, he will do so without my catechising him. I want to suggest to him that some Senators here have learned from experience when other measures were pending that such Executive suggestions do not materialize when the test comes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I suggested it was because the inference I got from the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi was that the House would not accept the bill if there was a change in it. I may be wrong. That is the reason why I suggested to the Senator from Wisconsin that he ask the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say that all gentlemen are at liberty to speculate.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. If it is true that to amend the reciprocity bill with the free-list bill would defeat them both, then it absolutely means that the free-list bill has no chance whatever to become a law unless we do attach it to that bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a moment.

Mr. President, I concur in the view expressed by the Senator from Texas, and, sir, it is equally true then, without doubt, that an independent reduction of the duties in Schedule K would have no chance to become a law. If we honestly desire to relieve the people of some of the excessive burdens of taxation by reducing tariff duties, the amendment of this Canadian tariff bill offers us the opportunity, and the only opportunity which may come to us during the life of the present administration.

The friends of this Canadian bill aver that they have the votes to pass it. I believe their confidence is well grounded. It will go to a President who will sign it. He might veto an independent tariff bill, making wholesome reductions in the duties on woolens and cottons and adding to the free list articles which will substantially benefit the farmers, who, by the terms of the so-called reciprocity bill, are to surrender their market to Canada. But if we add these just and righteous reductions to the Canadian tariff bill the entire measure will receive Executive approval. Thus the agricultural interests will be in some measure compensated for the loss of their markets and the consumers throughout the entire country secure a measure of the downward revision of tariff duties which they were promised in 1908.

If we will make reductions in the woolen and cotton schedules which we can safely make—reductions which will wrong no manufacturing interest, reductions which will leave a margin of safety above the line of difference in production cost between this and the competing countries—with the loss of only a modest revenue, we shall save to the purchasers the better part of $200,000 annually. Sir, this would be a great service to the people of this country everywhere. This Canadian tariff bill, passed just as the President desired it, will benefit nobody but Canada, the railroads, a few trusts, and the newspapers.

Mr. President, shall we incur the risk of letting this chance of at least a partial tariff revision go by? How shall we answer to the public if we then fail of tariff reduction altogether?

Sir, the President has declared Schedule K an "indefensible outrage." Further, he made a campaign and was elected upon a declaration that the revision of the tariff should be downward and not upward. I believe he will think it unwise to withhold approval of a bill that enacts into law his particular measure—this Canadian pact, which is not reciprocity in any sense—because we have amended it, even though not to his liking. This will be especially true when our amendments actually reduce taxation upon the people of this country by revising downward that same Schedule K and some others nearly, if not quite, so intolerable.

In advocating reductions I am unwilling, with my view of tariff revision, to go further than the present information will justify.

Mr. President, what I shall offer to the Senate as an amendment to the Canadian administration bill, as a revision of Schedule K and of the cotton schedule, will be shown to be easily and safely within the line of the difference in production cost. It will be offered with the expectation that when the Tariff Board shall have completed its expert work upon any one of these schedules that schedule can be taken up by Congress for thorough and scientific revision. I have no doubt that when that work shall have been done it will be found that upon the difference in the cost of production between this and the competing countries we can cut far below the duties which I shall propose in the amendments I offer.

Mr. President, just one word further with reference to the suggestion I made that there was an Executive threat here that this bill would be vetoed if it were in any way amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reference to what I said a moment ago, that there may be no misunderstanding I wish to say that there has been no communication with the President of the United States to me to that effect, or anything similar to it, if the Senator from Wisconsin really meant that. I thought he was joking.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator mean an official or a personal communication?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any sort involving any expression of what the President would do in regard to any veto upon any subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Mississippi make that statement. I was not quite able to interpret just what the Senator meant by the statement that he had taken pains to ascertain whether it would not become a law later.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me one further interruption, I will state what I meant by that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said there was a twofold danger; that the first and greatest danger was that after the amendment had been tacked upon the Canadian reciprocity bill enough Republican Senators now supporting Canadian reciprocity would desert the combination of the two to defeat both. But it is a mere speculation upon the part of the Senator from Wisconsin, and upon my part, as to what the President of the United States will do with a free-list bill or with the woolen schedule. I agree with him that the President of the United States would probably sign a properly reconstructed woolen schedule, but it is a mere speculation as to both.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin can afford to involve in that speculation the Canadian reciprocity bill because he is not in favor of it, so that if the President did veto the two both would be dead, and he would not care so much. But I can not afford to involve in the speculation as to the free-list bill, for example, a speculation as to Canadian reciprocity. That is another risk.

The greatest risk is right on the floor of the Senate. Republicans here who are supporting the administration and voting for Canadian reciprocity would probably vote against that, but others would tack it on. Those who want to defeat Canadian reciprocity, of course, would join hands with the Senator from Wisconsin, who would be willing, in good faith, to vote for the measure as amended.

They would join hands with him until they had amended it and then they would join hands with those who had left the bill to defeat the measure as amended, and enough Republicans who are supporting Canadian reciprocity now would leave the two measures tacked one to the other to defeat the combined measure. That is what I meant. I have taken some trouble to try to satisfy myself whether or not that would be the result, and whether I arrived at an accurate conclusion or not, I arrived at a conclusion satisfactory to myself that it would be the result.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no means of knowing how thoroughly the Senator from Mississippi made his investigation or how accurate his conclusion. In this matter I can speak only for myself. If the administration bill can be so amended as to compensate the farmers for the loss of their markets by reducing tariff duties, and hence reducing excessive prices for commodities and supplies which they and all the people must buy from our protected manufacturers, trusts, and combinations, then, sir, I would vote for the bill so amended.

Mr. President, if the Democrats on this floor will stand for amending the reciprocity bill by reducing these duties, which can not be justified, on woolen goods, making a saving of $100,000,000 to the people who must buy clothing; by reducing the duties on cotton goods, making a saving of fifty or more millions annually to the people who must buy cotton clothing; and by further reducing duties upon certain items in other schedules, I have no doubt——

Mr. OVERMAN. And increasing the free list.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And by reasonably increasing the free list I have no doubt we will be able to send to the President a reciprocity bill amended by tariff provisions that, on the whole, will be beneficial to the entire country. I believe the agricultural interests of this country will take the reductions that will come to them from the reciprocity pact if at the same time they can have just, reasonable, and proper offsets and compensation in reduction of the excessive duties on the things they have to buy.

Sooner or later, in the consideration of this Canadian pact, the Senate will come, Mr. President, to pass upon exactly that question, and it will not be necessary for any Senator upon the Democratic side or any Senator upon the Republican side to set the progressives in this body up as targets for their jibes and sneers. We will take care of our record, if you will take care of yours. Do not worry about that. We will perform our duty according to our lights, as you perform yours according to your lights.

I have had no authority conferred upon me to speak for the progressive Republiacns in this matter; but, sir, basing my judgment upon the record which they have made upon tariff legislation, I believe I have fairly stated their position.

For my own part, upon this motion, Mr. President, believing that the Senate is in possession of all the facts necessary to act upon this bill and that the public interest will be subserved by its adoption, because it will bring to a speedy determination the questions that are pending before the Senate, I shall support it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator one question before he takes his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator to say that if a solid or something like a solid Democratic vote can be secured in favor of an amendment to the reciprocity treaty, embracing the several schedules to which he has referred, and including the putting of certain things upon the free list, enough votes can be secured from that side of the Chamber to amend the treaty in this respect, and then to pass the treaty, even if every Republican now supporting the treaty shall abandon it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in my judgment, having in mind the public record of the progressive Republican Senators, I believe a reasonable tariff revision along the lines which I have suggested can be made a part of the President's bill, and that, when so amended, the bill will receive the same support upon its passage. I make this statement, not because I am commissioned by progressive Republican Senators to announce their votes upon this bill (and I certainly do not assume to deliver any votes upon any proposition), but I know something of the views and the records of progressive Republicans and of their controlling purpose to serve the public interest, and I state what I believe the results will fully confirm.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The question I wish to have the Senator answer is, Whether if that proposition should receive something like a solid Democratic support, in the judgment of the Senator would it receive enough votes from the other side to pass it with the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In my judgment, if the Democrats, who have been criticizing the progressives and speculating as to whether they were merely talking for effect upon the tariff two years ago, will just make sure of the votes upon the Democratic side to amend the so-called reciprocity bill by reducing tariff duties along the lines which I have suggested, then, I repeat, in my judgment there will be enough progressive Republican votes not only to amend but to pass the bill through the Senate. That is precisely what I mean.

Mr. President, the course which I have marked out is the only way to insure at this session real tariff reductions which will be of any substantial benefit to the consumers of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, ordinarily I would not support a motion of this character, because I believe that under the circumstances which usually surround this body a committee to which a bill is assigned should have an opportunity to consider it without an instruction of this sort. But we are not surrounded by ordinary circumstances. It is idle to disregard the atmosphere that fills this Chamber, and that has filled it from the beginning of the session until the present moment. The man who does not know in a general way what has been proposed with regard to the work of this session has closed his eyes and has deadened his ears to the most obvious facts all about us.

I am not imputing it to any especial source, but it is well known that it is proposed to pass the alleged reciprocity measure unamended and allow it to become a law. It is well known that the Finance Committee has not proposed and has not intended to report any other bill which looks to the revision of the law of 1909. I am not criticizing that committee, but their point of view is just as well understood as is the point of view of anyone who has expressed his opinion openly upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. LODGE. As one member of the Finance Committee, I desire to say to the Senator there has never been any such understanding on the part of the Finance Committee within my knowledge, or of any kind. As one member, I expected those bills to be dealt with and reported at the earliest possible moment; I do not say how reported, but reported to the Senate at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is immaterial how they are reported; but I have heard so often the suggestion that we must not enter upon the revision of any of the schedules of the tariff until we had the complete and final report of the Tariff Board, with respect to such schedules as may be attacked, that I can not but believe that I have correctly stated the intent. Mark you, I did not use the word "understanding." I do not suppose there has been any agreement among the members of the Finance Committee about it; but I do know, if I am permitted to believe what my eyes see and my ears hear, that it is not expected that we shall enter upon the revision or the consideration of any other schedules of the tariff save those which are involved in the alleged reciprocity measure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply desire to say, as one member of the Committee on Finance, there has been no such intent, no such purpose, but I expected that we would report on both of the important bills which passed the House and have them acted on during this session. If there is any understanding of any member of the Finance Committee to the contrary, it has been an understanding in his own mind, which he has not conveyed to the other members of that committee, so far as I know.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to state as a member of that committee, and as chairman, that it has always been my intention, and my publicly expressed intention, to call a meeting of the committee immediately on the receipt of this wool bill and proceed in good faith to the consideration of it. I have been in receipt of thousands of requests from people from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean and from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico asking for hearings on the free-list bill and on the wool bill, and I have answered all their communications, and informed them that when the wool bill was received by the committee those bills would be taken up promptly, and that they would receive ample notice of the hearings.

As to the character of the report, of course, there was no assurance, but that the bills would be reported at some time or other certainly and proceeded with was distinctly understood among all the members of the committee. If it shall be the will of the Senate that these thousands of persons shall be denied the same rights which were patiently extended to the agricultural interests of the country on the reciprocity bill, it will not be the fault of the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not doubt in the least degree the statements just made by the chairman of the Finance Committee, but I remember that a few days ago I read a report which seemed to come from the Finance Committee—I mean from the chairman of the Finance Committee—immediately after he had visited the Executive Mansion.

I read the report in one of the Washington newspapers—I do not know how accurate it may have been—the substance of which was that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] had just been in consultation with the President; that he had reassured him respecting the early passage of the reciprocity bill without any amendment whatsoever, and had stated that it was his opinion that Congress would be able to reach an early adjournment, and I think the first part of July was mentioned as the probable date of the adjournment. I put that together with a great many other things. I do not want the members of the committee to think that I am criticizing them; they have a perfect right to conclude that there ought to be no general tariff revision at this session; they have a perfect right to assume that they ought to wait until they secure the evidence or the facts which may be at some time in the future reported to them by the Tariff Board.

I only say these things in order to show the Senate why I have believed that it was not the intent of the Finance Committee and not the intent of those who have been in supremacy in the Senate of the United States, to allow any changes in the tariff, save those that are proposed in the alleged reciprocity arrangement with Canada.

There is no man in the Senate or in the country who is more anxious than am I to establish freer commercial relations with our northern neighbor. There is no man who will go further than I will go in order to accomplish that most desirable result. I believe that Canada has given to us or proposes to give to us in the arrangement we now have before us substantially all that she can give; but I do not believe, if we want to do toward Canada a tardy justice and to do toward our own people an equally belated justice, that we have given to Canada all that she deserves or all that the welfare of our people demands.

My first insistence is that this arrangement shall be so modified as not to demand especially more of Canada, although Canada ought to change the arrangement in one or two respects, but to change it with regard to the concessions that we grant Canada, and when we admit from Canada her agricultural products free, that we shall at the same time admit all her manufactured products free, so that in so far as Canada is concerned, the farmers of the United States shall have as free a market in which to buy as it is proposed they shall have in which to sell.

But further than that, we all understand that, granting practical free trade to Canada—and I think it can be granted to Canada without any inconsistency with the Republican doctrine of protection, so far as many manufactured articles are concerned—we have not done enough. We have not yet given the farmers or the persons who are particularly affected by the proposed arrangement with Canada that relief which justice to them demands. We have still to give them a freer market in which to buy, a market in which prices will not be enhanced by unjust and excessive duties. Therefore, it is not only our privilege, but it is our imperative duty, to enter upon a revision of such schedules of the tariff as particularly affect our relations with the remainder of the world, and reduce our duties to a point that will measure the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. So far as I am concerned—and I speak for no other man—my vote will not be cast for any adjournment of this session of Congress until, if the reciprocity treaty, so called, passes unamended, we have entered upon a revision of every schedule of our tariff which contains unjust and unfair duties.

I think for the reasons which have been given by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and which I outlined at an earlier time this afternoon, we ought to attach such legislation to the measure which has been called reciprocity with Canada, and I shall use all the influence I have to so attach that legislation, because I believe that if it is not so connected it will not receive the approval necessary to put it into effect, and that for two years yet the people must bear the burdens which have been created—no, not created, but perpetuated—by the act of 1909.

It seems to me that the commonest patriotism on the part of those who want these burdens alleviated will require them to so vote that when the arrangement with Canada becomes effective at the same moment these heavy duties shall fall from shoulders illy able to bear them.

I want to be perfectly frank. I do not make any bargain with anybody with regard to my vote. I care vastly with respect to the manner in which my friends on the other side of the Chamber shall cast their votes; I am deeply concerned in the view which they shall take of this vital subject; but, so far as I am concerned, it makes no difference how they shall cast their votes. If we are not able to attach to the reciprocity measure these revisions of the schedules of the tariff which ought to be revised, I shall vote to pass them as separate and independent measures in the form in which I believe they ought to be passed, and that form will witness a very great reduction in duties. It might just as well be understood, I think, that we have entered upon a revision of the tariff from the beginning to the end, and I care not whether we conclude it in June, or July, or August, or September, or October, or November. In so far as I am concerned, that effort will be continued until we either reach the desired result or a majority of the Senate has declared that the result ought not to be attained.

I believe that the Committee on Finance does not need any hearings with regard to the wool tariff. I am not agreed with the bill passed by the House of Representatives; I do not think it proceeds upon the right principle. I believe in specific duties on wool and woolen cloth and fabrics and garments, instead of ad valorem duties; but I am in entire sympathy with the effort to take away from the manufacturer of woolens in this country a large part of the so-called compensatory duty which, on its very face, bears the evidence of its unrighteousness as well as of its unsoundness. I shall do what I can to secure such reductions in the schedule as I believe should take place in it; and, whatever may be the outcome of the struggle, we might just as well bring it upon the floor of the Senate with the information that we have and that is accessible to us on every hand, and dispose of it according to the views and opinions of a majority of the Members of this body.

I do not want to be discourteous to the Finance Committee, and especially to its chairman, and if he would indicate that the time suggested in the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma was five days too short or ten days too short, I would be disposed to yield to his views in that respect; but he has made no such suggestion and opposes, as I understand, the motion, because he believes the time ought not to be limited at all. In that respect I can not agree with him.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. On that point, Mr. President, it is not possible to gauge the length of the hearing. The committee patiently listened to over 100 persons for a period of nearly a month on the reciprocity bill; and the other measures open questions of far greater complication and extent.

All that I can assure the Senator is that the committee will do as it did in the case of the reciprocity measure—meet promptly at 10 o'clock in the morning, continue the hearings without missing a day, and endeavor to comply with what is ordinarily accepted as the right of an American citizen to be granted a hearing by a committee of Congress. If, as the work progresses, it becomes evident to the Senate that the committee ought to be discharged, it is within the power of the Senate to discharge the committee; but it certainly is unprecedented to limit the time which the committee may have to consider a bill at the same time that the bill is referred, and it is certainly rank injustice to thousands of Democrats and Republicans scattered all over the country who have petitioned for a hearing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Whether it is unprecedented or not, Mr. President, I do not know; but if it is unprecedented, the justification for it lies in the fact that we are surrounded by unprecedented circumstances.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance one question. The chairman of the committee has several times this afternoon given the Senate assurance that there would be hearings.

Mr. PENROSE. Right away.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator has not given the Senate the assurance that after a reasonable time devoted to the hearings the committee will report the bill back to the Senate either favorably or unfavorably. Does the Senator give the Senate that assurance?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have not consulted with the members of the committee. I assume that, when the hearings are closed, the committee will necessarily have to take some action on these measures. They will either have to report the bills favorably or unfavorably, or the committee will have to agree not to proceed further with the consideration of the measures until the fall. In that case it is within the power of the Senate to discharge the committee and acquire possession of the bills.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has been customary here, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, when the chairman of a great committee was interrogated as to his purpose to report a bill back to the Senate during the session of the Senate, to give a categorical answer; and I think the Senate is entitled to have the Senator from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Finance Committee, say absolutely and without qualification whether it is the purpose of the committee—I can not believe that the Senator is in doubt about the purpose of the committee—to report this bill back at this session.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I can——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will put it in another way; I will ask the Senator if it is not the purpose of the committee not to report the bill back?

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator desires an answer to his question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from North Carolina is a member of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. But a minority member.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, every member of that committee is in the minority. Of course when the hearings are closed and every person has had a fair and reasonable chance to explain his views on the pending measures, it will be in the power of any member of that committee to move that the bill be reported favorably, and that motion can be amended so that the question will be that it be reported unfavorably; and neither I nor any other member of the committee can prevent a vote upon that motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with regard to that, it occurs to me that if this motion is adopted, and if, when the 10th of July shall come, a majority of the committee shall feel that it is necessary to have further time in which to take evidence, that request could well be laid before the Senate, and it would be judged according to the situation as it may then exist.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on that point I will say candidly that I would not feel justified or warranted in assuring the citizens of the United States who are interested in these controversies that they could have a hearing and at the same time not have any assurance that the committee will have full power to carry out its promise. Many of these gentleman live at a distance from the Capital, so that they can not reach here under 5, 6, or 10 days. They must notify the other persons engaged in the industry in which they are concerned; they must have an opportunity to confer with each other, to select their speakers, to organize the committee which shall come to Washington, to have a date fixed for the hearing, and how that can be done in any sort of good faith or fairness in the limited period suggested by this motion or in any period suggested to-day, I am at a loss to understand.

When the Senator from Texas, a member of this committee, had constituents from Texas in Washington and asked to have a hearing on the free-list bill, the committee cheerfully and willingly and promptly gave it to them, and they have assured other persons who made the request at that time that they would be given a hearing. But these people can not come here on a 24-hour telegraphic notice, and they can not be expected to, and I for one am not prepared to say to the Senate that I will advise these scores of persons anxious to have a hearing that they can have one when the limitation of time may make it impossible.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator from Iowa and to the Senator from Pennsylvania that this is not an unprecedented proceeding. One of the most important tariff acts in all our history was taken from the table and considered without any reference to the Finance Committee, and the Senate was moved to that action by the same apprehension that evidently controls it now, which was that the committee might not report it back to the body at that session. That apprehension arose, not out of the fact that the committee as then organized was in opposition to the majority sentiment of the Senate, but out of the fact that one of the members of the committee happened to be absent, and it was feared that the committee, in his absence, would be unable to report.

Mr. SMOOT. Was it not also due to the fact that the committee was a tie—with one absent member?

Mr. BAILEY. It was a tie in the absence of that Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. In so far as we know this committee is a tie.

Mr. BAILEY. This could not very well be equally divided, with a full attendance, because it consists of an odd number. It was an odd number then, but the absence of the Senator, who I believe was Senator Spaight, of North Carolina, left the committee evenly divided.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me one word there?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Iowa has kindly and very courteously expressed his regard for my feelings as chairman of the committee, and I thank him for his expressions, and appreciate them. But my feelings are in no way sensitive. I recognize the fact that the Republican Party no longer controls this Chamber, and if the pending motion passes this body I shall be compelled to notify the scores and hundreds of persons who have requested what is ordinarily considered a right—to be heard—that they are denied it by order of the United States Senate and that hearings will not be had.

I am quite content to stand upon the record as made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was quite sincere in expressing——

Mr. PENROSE. I know you were.

Mr. CUMMINS. My appreciation of the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. PENROSE. I know that, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do not believe that he can mean what he has just said. I do not think that he will notify the American people that the Republicans are no longer in control of the Senate. He may in his place upon this floor, but he will not as chairman of the Finance Committee.

It is perfectly evident anyhow that, so far as this tariff discussion is concerned, from beginning to end, the Members of the Senate do not divide upon political lines. The Senator from Pennsylvania himself is not aligned upon the Republican side, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] claims, on the reciprocity bill, as carrying into effect Republican doctrine. Who shall be the censor of Republican policies or Republican morals in this Chamber?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Who shall determine who is or who is not a Republican? The Senator from Idaho says——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho says that any man who is for free trade with Canada in agricultural products is not a Republican.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma. He was the first to ask.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa for yielding to me, because I wish, before we proceed too far from the notice which the Senator from Pennsylvania has given us and which he has advised us he intends to serve upon the American people touching their desire to appear before the Finance Committee, to say that I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania, when he sends that notice to any portion of the American people, will append this postscript—that they have 20 days in which to appear before that committee and present their views upon the pending bill, which involves only one schedule, and that the Payne-Aldrich bill, involving every schedule, involving 4,000 items, was received in the Senate on April 10 and was reported to the Senate on April 12, two days having been set aside by the committee of which the Senator from Pennsylvania is now chairman to allow 90,000,000 people to express their views on four thousand and several items.

I trust the Senator from Pennsylvania will append a postscript of that description, in order that he may be just to the Senate of the United States, to the people of the United States, and to those who have supported the pending motion.

I thank the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will, after the Senator from Idaho shall have concluded.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply want to say briefly that two years ago a number of informal hearings were granted by the Finance Committee of the Senate to persons desiring a hearing. There was no general request, because all those people had appeared before the House Committee on Ways and Means. This year what is commonly and in a slang phrase called the "steam-roller process" was applied in the House of Representatives, and this bill comes over here without any of those people having had an opportunity to have even a day in court.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a brief answer.

Mr. GORE. I wish to propound this inquiry to the Senator: Those informal hearings of which we have heard before this, and of which we hear so much now, were had after the bill was reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. They were held three months before the bill ever reached the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to yield further for the discussion of what occurred in connection with the Payne-Aldrich legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield further.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Oklahoma was just finishing his sentence.

Mr. GORE. I merely wish to state that the people on this occasion should have a like opportunity here in these informal secret hearings as two years ago.

I thank the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Iowa inquired as to where the principle and power of the Republican Party were to be found.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President. The Senator from Idaho does not state it with his usual accuracy.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator used better language. I would be glad to have him repeat the language.

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked who in this Chamber——

Mr. HEYBURN. Ah!

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the censor of Republican morals or Republican policies?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Republican majority, acting through its organized caucus, is the master of Republicans, and the man who does not recognize it is not a Republican.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I want the Senator from Idaho and the Senate of the United States and the whole world to understand that no caucus of any party or of any element of society can determine for me what I shall do or to what party I shall belong.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has given himself the status that I think will be conceded to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; a status of which I am very proud. I recognize the doctrine of protection which was announced by the Republican Party in 1908, and I intend to carry it into effect as faithfully as I can, but no body of men on earth can tell me how to apply the principle that was announced in 1903.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is to correct what I think is a wrong impression as to what I was addressing my remarks to.

The Senator's inquiry was concerning this Canadian tariff bill, and he cited certain instances where it received support or did not, and then inquired in connection with that as to where the test was to be found. I say that this is not a Republican measure—it matters not to me who supports it—because it has not a majority of the Republicans in this Chamber to support it, and it did not come here vouched for by a majority of the Republicans elsewhere, and it can only originate in Congress, and I repudiate the idea that legislation can receive its political character outside of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. The action of a Republican caucus upon this measure would make it neither better nor worse. But I agree entirely with the Senator from Idaho in his conclusion that it is not a Republican measure, and I might just as well say frankly that, so far as I am concerned, I intend to do what I can to bring before the Senate revisions of other schedules in this tariff before the measure with Canada is voted upon.

We need not conceal our purposes here, because they are open, I think; visible to everybody. I for one would like the arrangement with Canada or the bill which was passed by the House of Representatives and reported by the committee so amended that it could command my conscience and my support. But it is impossible for Senators to dream of the consideration of a measure of this character and its final disposition by this body until these other measures are also before the Senate and under the consideration of this body.

I therefore, deprecating of course the feeling that there is any discourtesy to the committee intended by this motion, feeling that my highest duty to the American people demands that this and all other measures that are intended for the revision of the tariff shall be before us and under consideration, shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume the State which I have the honor in part to represent is as much interested in the woolen schedule, perhaps, as any one of three or four States that might be mentioned, and I should, of course, very much desire in a matter of such importance to my constituents that they should have an opportunity to be heard. If I were convinced that a hearing could have any effect, I would not vote to deny them that hearing. But, Mr. President, I do not know just what effect a hearing would have with reference to the woolen schedule.

I know precisely what effect it had with reference to the reciprocity bill. The committee treated the farmers who came here with all deference and courtesy, and listened to them, the farmers knowing all the time and the committee knowing all the time, and everybody else knowing all the time, that it did not make any difference what they said or what facts were produced. The decree had gone forth that the reciprocity agreement was to be passed as written. And if the farmers had been heard for the next six months and had produced the most conclusive evidence, as they did, of the injustice and unfairness of that agreement, it would not have made a particle of difference as to its ultimate passage in the Senate.

That agreement was made elsewhere, and the decree had gone forth that it must pass. Senators standing upon the floor to-day were moved almost to tears because they must part with the farmers, with whom "they had grown up"; but they must part. And sad as it all was, they took their departure. I could only understand the tearful exhibition upon the theory that there was a deep consciousness of being about to do the farmer an injustice. They give to the farmers tears. They give to the manufacturers protection. I have no doubt the farmer would prefer to have his protection and let the manufacturer have the tears.

But it would not serve any good purpose, Mr. President, to bring these wool men here from all parts of the country under the conditions which confront us with reference to legislating at this session. So far as I am concerned, if it is within my power, by vote or otherwise, to drag into the Senate Chamber every single schedule and revise the Payne-Aldrich bill, I am now ready and willing to do it. So, I say, that, knowing that my State is as much interested in the woolen schedule as perhaps any other State in the Union, nevertheless I am ready to begin a general revision.

If we are to have absolute free trade as to the farmer, then we must certainly have revision of the tariff as to all other important schedules in order to have even a semblance of performing our duty here. Believing that we can discover the defects, if there be any, and ascertain the facts, if we need them, to determine what we should do with reference to the woolen schedule precisely the same as was determined with reference to the reciprocity agreement, I see no reason why we should not do it. It will keep us here a considerable length of time, but it is much more important that we do this right than that we go home; and I do not believe we can justify ourselves by refusing now, as we have an opportunity, to revise the entire tariff in the Senate to the satisfaction of those who think it ought to be done; I believe that it ought to be revised in many respects.

Therefore, while I would not for a moment vote for anything in the nature of a criticism or condemnation of the committee, I think the sooner we get the entire tariff bill into the Senate at this session and commence work we will be at that work which it is our duty at this session to perform.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that I am going to support the reciprocity measure. I reached that conclusion after a very careful study of the testimony. I shall not vote for any proposed amendment to the reciprocity agreement that is likely to defeat it, but I do think, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just said, that the sooner we get a tariff measure in here revising all the principal schedules the better it will be for the country and the better it will be for the Republican Party. I should like to see the Republican members of the Finance Committee get together and exclude the Democratic members and prepare a tariff bill along Republican lines, present it possibly to the full committee for their consideration first, and then bring it into this body, and let us consider it. As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said, the woolen bill that has been sent over here is not framed on Republican lines, and I should like to see this bill acted on by the Republican membership of the Finance Committee and that they should bring into this body a bill framed on Republican lines for our consideration.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is the reciprocity bill framed on Republican lines?

Mr. JONES. I think it is, and I shall state my reasons for it later on. I have come to that conclusion after a very careful consideration of it. I want to say that the only question which made me hesitate in regard to it was as to whether or not I could justify that measure along the line of the Republican policies I have heretofore advocated. I believe I can; at least I am satisfied of it in my judgment, and my reasons for it I will present later on.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator has come to the conclusion, then, that everybody in this country is entitled to protection except the farmers.

Mr. JONES. No; I do not agree with the Senator on that. I think I am just as sincere in my opinion with reference to the protective character of the reciprocity agreement as the Senator from Minnesota, and I know that he is honest and sincere in the matter.

I believe that the Republicans of this body owe it to themselves and to the country to make some revision of the woolen schedule, and of the metal schedule, and of the sugar schedule, and of the cotton schedule, and, possibly, some other schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator how he felt in relation to the tariff on lumber as provided in this bill. He is from a lumber State, and I want to know if he thinks that it is fair and right that lumber finished on one side——

Mr. JONES. I am not going into those details now, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a question of tariff.

Mr. JONES. I will discuss that at the proper time, and my constituency will be pretty well satisfied with my position. They have not any protection on lumber now.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator does not want to yield, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. JONES. I do not care to go into details with reference to these matters. I want to state my position generally because of the vote I am going to give on this matter and from the fact that very likely after to-day I will not be on the floor of the Senate very much while the matter is under consideration, because I will be engaged upon an investigation ordered by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is very poor reciprocity to have a 50-cent rate on lumber into the United States and a $1 rate on lumber going into Canada.

Mr. JONES. I will answer to my constituency upon that matter so far as they are affected by that proposition, and I think satisfactorily to them as well as satisfactorily to myself.

I voted for the Payne-Aldrich bill, and I voted for it without any apology. It was not exactly the sort of measure I should have liked. I voted for a great many what I consider fundamental propositions to that bill that were not included in it, but I considered that bill as a step forward, and I believe so yet. However, the people of the country have not been satisfied with it. There is not any question about that. They want to have some changes made in it; and I believe that it is for the best interests of the people and the best interests of the Republican Party, now that we are in session here, to proceed with the revision of the schedules that practically everybody concedes ought to be revised to a certain extent. My vote will be cast for considering these propositions.

If the Finance Committee will bring into the Senate a bill embodying a revision of these various schedules along Republican lines, not radical but reasonable in its scope, then I will vote to put that on the reciprocity bill, because in my judgment a measure of that kind would be signed by the Executive.

I have no authority to speak for him, as far as that is concerned, because I have not discussed the matter with him at all; but it is my judgment that if a measure of this sort were framed by the Republican members of the Finance Committee, and they are just as competent to do it to-day as they will be in a month from now with all the hearings they may hold, and if they bring it into this body and put it on the reciprocity bill, and it goes to the President of the United States, he will sign it, and it will become law. I believe the people of this country would be satisfied with what the Republican Party has done, and that they would be satisfied with what Congress has done.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to vote for this motion. I would rather have a motion directing the committee to report out by the 1st of August a bill revising all of these various schedules in one measure. But I suppose a proposition of that sort might not meet with favor. I believe that until the 10th day of July is not an abundance of time to give all the hearings that ought to be held with reference to this matter. Read the vast amount of testimony that has been taken on this reciprocity measure, and it is page after page of repetition after repetition of facts and arguments that ought to be confined and condensed into one-tenth of the volume that it is now in.

If the committee will direct the representatives of the woolen manufacturers to send here one or two men to present their side of the proposition and the woolgrowers one or two men to present their side of the proposition, they can get all the information in one or two days that they could get at hearings held for a month with reference to the measure. As far as that is concerned, the members of the Finance Committee are themselves just as well equipped to prepare a measure of this kind, with a proper revision of this schedule, as they will be the 10th day of July.

So I propose to vote for this motion as a Republican. I do not care to put any prefixes or affixes to it, or anything of the sort, but as a Republican within the Republican Party I propose to vote for this motion, and I propose to vote in a way that will possibly bring about a reasonable revision of these various schedules of the tariff act.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator from Washington takes his seat let me ask him, Do I understand the Senator to proclaim now that he would vote to tack on this bill a revision of the entire tariff from a Republican standpoint?

Mr. JONES. I would.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would the Senator vote for it if from a Republican standpoint there was incorporated in it honest protection for the farm products of this country?

Mr. JONES. I would.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then does the Senator think that this bill would ever be signed by the President, or does he think it would ever be adopted by the Canadian Parliament, if it contained any protection whatever to the farm products of this country?

Mr. JONES. I do not agree with the Senator that we are taking away all the protection of the farm products.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am asking if the Senator will vote for an amendment to this bill which shall give adequate protection to farm products—the cereals, wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax—and tack it on this agreement?

Mr. JONES. I think this reciprocity agreement will not do the farmers of this country any injury.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the question.

Mr. JONES. Therefore no amendment along the line the Senator proposes would appeal to me at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the question I asked the Senator. The Senator suggested that he would vote for an amendment which should be considered from the Republican standpoint and should be passed as a Republican measure and attach it to this bill. Now, I want to know if he would do that even though the majority of the Republicans believed that the farm products I have mentioned ought to be protected?

Mr. JONES. I will not vote for an amendment to this bill, as I said a moment ago, that I think will defeat it or for the purpose of defeating it. I do not believe that a proposition along the line I have already suggested would defeat it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would defeat it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions that it shall be reported back not later than the 10th day of July next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1911.

Infinite Spirit, whose life-giving rays permeate all space and whose love reaches out to all mankind, we thank Thee for that strong, intelligent, and ever-growing faith which recognizes Thee as the Father of all men, which enhances, dignifies, and ennobles life, takes away the sting, the fear of death, and fills the heart with eternal hope, accentuates the sinfulness of sin, and inspires to holy living. Grant, O most merciful Father, that it may continue to grow until all men shall know Thee and worship Thee as such in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, June 20, 1911, was read and approved.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

"That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"'The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

"'When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

"'This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.'"

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] desires to submit a motion.

Mr. OLMSTED. I move that the House do concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, has this amendment been printed?

Mr. OLMSTED. It has not been printed.

Mr. CANNON. It occurs to me that the House ought to be in possession of the amendment in some other form besides the copy on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the amendment has been printed.

Mr. OLMSTED. The amendment has been printed in the Senate, but only in the form of an amendment proposed to be introduced by Mr. BRISTOW.

Mr. CANNON. I listened to the reading of the amendment from the Clerk's desk, and, as I caught it, I do not think the reading conformed to the print of what purports to be an amendment proposed in another body by a Senator. It occurs to me that the House ought to be in possession of the official copy of the amendment as reported at the Clerk's desk, and that it ought to be in print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the Clerk is in possession of the official copy of the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair is in possession of a printed copy of that amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I have not been able to get it.

Mr. MANN. It is the same as the Bristow amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the Speaker will observe, what he holds in his hand is a copy of an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BRISTOW, and so forth. I will state, however, that I understand it is precisely the amendment which the Senate did adopt.

The SPEAKER. What is the trouble about it then?

Mr. CANNON. The trouble is that we must resort to the Senate files, if the gentleman is correct in his statement, rather than to our own files, to get a printed copy. And, having listened to the amendment as read from the Clerk's desk, I am not sure that the printed copy which we have is identical with what was read by the Clerk.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again read, so that we may compare it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House that, while this amendment has been on the Speaker's table for three or four or five days, by agreement all around it was not to be precipitated on the House until after we had disposed of the wool bill, so that nobody has had a chance to have it printed.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if we are to depend on the Senate print of the proposed amendment, I should be glad to have the official amendment read again so that it can be compared.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I received recognition from the Chair for the purpose of making a motion, and I do not want to lose the floor. I want to have control of it pending this consideration. I desire to make a motion to disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In comparing the original House resolution with what is known as the Bristow amendment, I find that that does not seem to be in the resolution as read from the Clerk's desk at all. I will state in the first place that I endeavored to get a copy of the resolution as it passed the Senate and was informed that it had not been printed. I examined the RECORD, and when the resolution was read from the Clerk's desk it did correspond with the original resolution passed by the House, except some amendments, which do not strike me as very material. The Bristow amendment, as I understand it from report, does not appear in the resolution read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken; the Clerk read the Bristow amendment.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman will look on page 1938 of the RECORD——

Mr. MANN. But the original papers are here.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think this is material, if the gentleman will let me proceed, and if I am wrong I can be corrected. On page 1938 of the RECORD we find this language:

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the substitute proposed by Mr. BRISTOW by adding, on page 2, after line 2, the following:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may make or alter such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect or refuse to make such regulations, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same."

Now, I would like to know whether or not that is in the resolution as read by the Clerk?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman has not read the Bristow amendment; he is reading the so-called Bacon amendment.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The RECORD, as I understand, refers to it as the Bristow amendment; if wrong, I stand corrected; I was asking for information.

The SPEAKER. But the RECORD does not control. The House acts upon the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. MANN. The RECORD is right, and the gentleman is mistaken; he has not read the Bristow amendment.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference, the House is bound by the papers in its possession.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if, on page 2, lines 10, 11, and 12, the Bristow amendment did not eliminate those three lines and leave section 4 of Article I of the Constitution just as it was prior to the offering of the amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What is there now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri to disagree to the Senate amendment, followed by the preferential motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to concur in the Senate amendment, and the debate will take place in the first place on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to concur.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to confer with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the question of time, because it is important that we do not prolong the debate. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how much time is desired for debate?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have received requests for about two hours and a half on this side.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. A great many gentlemen are very anxious to get through with this matter as speedily as possible.

Mr. OLMSTED. What would the gentleman from Missouri suggest?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. An hour and a half on each side.

Mr. OLMSTED. Could not the gentleman make it two hours?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Can not the gentleman agree to an hour and a half on a side?

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, make it an hour and three-quarters on a side.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent for an hour and three-quarters on each side for general debate; that the time on this side be controlled by myself and on the other side by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that there be a debate of an hour and three-quarters on a side, and that the time on the Democratic side be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and on the other side by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. MANN. And at the end of that time the previous question shall be ordered?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. And he further asks that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. CARLIN. And the general debate is to be on both motions?

The SPEAKER. Upon both motions.

Mr. OLMSTED. If my motion prevails there will not be any motion to disagree.

The SPEAKER. Upon that question the Chair will express no opinion. [Laughter.] Is there objection to the request?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, there was so much confusion I could not hear what the request was.

The SPEAKER. If the House will be in order the Chair will state the request again. The gentleman from Missouri asked unanimous consent that there be a debate of an hour and three-quarters on a side on these two motions; that the time on one side be controlled by himself and on the other by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and that at the expiration of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon both propositions. Is there objection?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to add, and that all gentlemen who address the House on either motion may have five days to extend remarks.

The SPEAKER. And that all gentlemen who make remarks on this subject shall have five days to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I expect the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] would like to lead off in behalf of his motion, and I will ask him to use some of his time.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the convention presided over by George Washington, which framed the Constitution of the United States, was composed of very wise and very farseeing men, whose names will be honored in the history of this Republic so long as the Republic itself shall endure. The instrument they framed with such wondrous care is the most valuable and important of its kind the world has ever known, and each added year brings fresh testimony to the wisdom of those to whom we so often refer as "the fathers." Only three times within the past 107 years have the people of the United States seen fit to alter or amend it. The organic law under which this Republic has so long lived, so wonderfully grown, and so marvelously prospered, should not be made the subject of experiment nor amended in any particular, except for the most weighty reasons, and then only with the utmost care and consideration. That Constitution, under which the First Congress assembled, in 1789, contains, in section 3 of Article I, this provision:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

The proposed amendment of that provision is not the result of recent suggestion. There has been for some years a demand for the election of Senators by the people. That demand has grown from year to year. It has been widely discussed, and the proposed change is well understood. Three times since I have been a Member of this body resolutions have passed this House proposing an amendment to the Constitution so as to permit the election of Senators by the people. With some misgivings as to the wisdom of the proposition, and some doubt whether the proposed method would result in improving the personnel of that body, I have in at least three different Republican Congresses voted to permit the election of Senators by the people, or at least to submit the proposition to the States for their approval. At this time there is not in this body any substantial opposition to that proposition. House joint resolution No. 39 as it passed the House, and also as it passed the Senate, contains a modification of the clause of section 3, which I have just quoted, to make it read as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

There is no longer any serious opposition to that change, and if that were all the resolution contained there would be hardly an opposing vote in this body. There are some other provisions in the resolution with reference to the filling of vacancies and providing that the amendment shall not affect the elections or terms of Senators chosen before it shall become valid as a part of the Constitution. There is no objection to those provisions. They all bear directly upon the single amendment of section 3, so as to provide for the election of Senators by the people instead of by the legislatures of the States.

The demand for such an amendment of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution is very great and very pressing. It comes from different parts of the country, in the form of petitions and resolutions of State legislatures and other bodies. That demand is borne to us upon a great wave of popular favor. Some of the supporters of this resolution are trying to ride that wave for a very different purpose and to bear away upon its crest the amendment of an entirely separate and distinct provision of the Constitution, for which there is no demand whatever, for which not a single petition has been presented, and for which, I venture to say, no Member of this House has received a single request from a constituent. Section 4 of Article I of the Constitution says—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Now, if you will turn to lines 10, 11, and 12, on page 2, of House joint resolution No. 39 as it passed the House, you will find that, not content with changing the method of electing Senators, not content with amending the third section of Article I of the Constitution so as to provide for the election of Senators by the people, it proposes also to amend section 4, for the lines I have named contain this language:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

This is declared, on page 1 of the resolution—

> To be in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators.

It omits these words, now found in section 4:

> But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

In other words, it takes away from Congress the power which it now has under the present Constitution to make or alter any regulations touching the election of Senators, as well as Representatives, and makes their election entirely subject to State control.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I presume it is in the gentleman's mind, having stated that it was that portion of the proposed amendment to which he objects, to tell the House why he objects to it, and I would like to know.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed to do so, and I hope to make my objection clear.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. If the Bristow amendment, which is now before the House for action, shall be adopted, the Constitution will remain the same, except that Senators will be directly elected by the people.

Mr. OLMSTED. That will be the only change.

Mr. KENDALL. And if the Bristow amendment is rejected, as proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, and the House resolution should be enacted into law, the Congress of the United States would surrender all authority over the election of Senators?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, as another gentleman was speaking to me at the moment, I did not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. KENDALL. If the resolution as it passed the House should be finally enacted into law, it would amount to a surrender on the part of Congress of any authority over the election of Senators.

Mr. OLMSTED. It would, indeed; and it is very questionable whether it would not so emasculate section 4 as to make it inoperative and ineffectual for any purpose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say that the proposition for the election of Senators by the people has passed this House in different times.

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has it ever passed this House with the amendment proposed in this House resolution—amending section 4?

Mr. OLMSTED. It never has to my knowledge—never. The demand for the change of that section sprung up only after the recent elections had changed the political complexion of this House.

Mr. KENDALL. Has that amendment ever been proposed in all the numerous times that the subject has been under discussion in the House until now?

Mr. OLMSTED. It never has.

This House joint resolution No. 39 has been amended by the Senate. That amendment, known as the Bristow amendment, is now before us. If we concur in the Bristow amendment then the constitutional amendment which will be submitted to the people will be precisely the same as the constitutional amendment which the House resolution in its original form proposed to submit, except that the words "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof" will be omitted. In other words, as amended by the Senate this resolution proposes to submit to the people the single question of the amendment of section 3 so as to provide for the election of Senators by the people. It eliminates the proposed amendment of section 4 and permits that section to remain in the Constitution in the same form in which it has always existed.

As I have already stated, there is no popular demand for the amendment of section 4. The amendment of that section has never been the subject of popular discussion. It is not understood by the people that anything of the kind is seriously contemplated.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman submit to a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I will in this instance, but my time is so limited that I must ask gentlemen not to interrupt.

Mr. HARDY. I just wanted to ask whether or not, historically, the Congress had ever undertaken to dictate as to the time or manner of the election of Senators under the clause of the Constitution to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. OLMSTED. Whether it has or has not does not affect the question.

Mr. HARDY. Except that it would be a very small matter to "kick" at, if in a hundred years——

Mr. OLMSTED. Then why "kick" at it? Why not leave it out, concur in this amendment, and let the matter go. [Applause on the Republican side.] As matter of fact, by the act of 1866, Congress has declared both the time and the manner in which Senators shall be elected.

Mr. HARDY. But the gentleman's objection is that it has not been utilized heretofore in the history of our country.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; that is the gentleman's objection—not mine—and it is not sound. It has been utilized. It is utilized to-day. Every Member of the United States Senate to-day was elected in pursuance of the dictation of an act of Congress passed in pursuance of authority contained in section 4 of Artile I of the Constitution. I call the gentleman's attention to sections 14 to 19 of the Revised Statutes.

The impression has gone abroad that the so-called Bristow amendment proposes to put into the Constitution something which is not now and never has been there, which in some way may be used to enforce certain results in the election of Senators. Nothing could be further from the fact. The Bristow amendment is an amendment to the House resolution. It does not propose any amendment to the Constitution. Its design and object is to prevent any amendment to the Constitution except in the single matter of providing that Senators shall be elected by the people and not by the legislatures of the States. The Bristow amendment proposes that whatever power the Constitution now gives to Congress in the matter of regulating elections of Senators and Representatives in Congress shall remain untouched. It neither adds to, nor subtracts from, that power.

Why should section 4 be amended at all? The Senate and the House are simply separate branches of the law-making body. Senators and Representatives are all Members of Congress; they are all officers of the Federal Government. It is intended that Senators as well as Representatives shall henceforth be elected by the people. What process of reasoning justifies any distinction or discrimination in the power of Congress to make or alter regulations touching the times, places, and manner of electing the Members of these two bodies? The fact that Senators are now to be elected in the same manner as Representatives affords all the more reason why the same power should continue to exist in Congress in the one case as in the other.

It has been urged in argument that there is no necessity for retaining this power in Congress at all as to either branch; that the power conferred by section 4 is not now used and is not likely to be. This is a grave mistake. The law which Congress heretofore put upon the statute books prohibiting corporations from making campaign contributions in Federal elections finds its sanction in section 4. Unless it be there found, Congress has no authority to pass any such law; unless section 4 authorizes Congress to require publicity of, or to limit, campaign expenses, then there was no authority in Congress to pass the law which it did pass one year ago, or for the further act which recently passed this body, and both those acts are invalid and of no account.

As long ago as 1842 it was found necessary for Congress to provide that the election of Representatives should be by districts. The only authority for that congressional action is found in section 4, and the same is true of the act of February 28, 1871 (16 Stat. L., 440), requiring all votes for Representatives to be by written or printed ballot; and then there is the act of 1872, and it is not necessary to mention the so-called enforcement acts, all of which were deemed necessary at the time of their passage, but all of which were repealed in 1894. The act of 1866, providing when and how Senators shall be elected, is in full force and operation.

The Democratic national platform of 1908 contains this plank:

> We demand the enactment of a law preventing any corporation from contributing to campaign funds and any individual from contributing an amount above a reasonable minimum, and providing for the publication before election of all such contributions above a reasonable minimum.

Adopt resolution No. 39 in the form in which it passed the House and Congress will be deprived of all power to pass any such enactment touching the election of Senators; and I am not sure but that you will have so emasculated section 4 as to take away from Congress the authority to pass any enactment whatever upon that subject. But, in any event, are you willing, Mr. Speaker, while placing the election of Senators in the hands of the people, to deprive Congress of the power to see that those elections are free from corrupt and contaminating influences? As there are only 2 Senators from each State, while some of the States send 10, 20, and one will soon send 40 Representatives, it follows that each Senator has vastly more power and influence in the making of laws than the average Representative. The argument is made that vast business interests seek to control legislatures in the election of United States Senators. If that be true, will they be any less likely to seek to control the election of Senators by the people? If it is so important to prevent corporations and individuals from controlling or influencing the election of Representatives, is it not vastly more important to prevent them from controlling the election of Senators, in whose elections they will be vastly more interested? Why shall not Congress retain the power which it now has to make or alter regulations for the election of Senators and Representatives, who are officers of the Federal Government?

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT. The proposed amendment which the Senate adopted would leave section 4 of this article unchanged, would not it?

Mr. OLMSTED. Entirely and utterly unchanged just as it exists now in the Constitution and as it has existed for more than a century and a quarter.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was going to ask the gentleman, under that section 4 would the gentleman think that Congress now would have any power to regulate the election of United States Senators in any way by prescribing qualifications for electors, registration laws, or returning boards. Does the gentleman think the power exists in the Congress now with reference to the election of Senators to prescribe any regulations for electing Senators?

Mr. OLMSTED. It has whatever power the Constitution now gives to Congress. That power we propose to preserve and we do not propose to do away with nor add to it in any way. We leave it unchanged. You propose to take that away——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. While technically an accurate statement, is that practically an accurate statement? Does not the very change of method from election by legislatures to election by direct vote change inevitably the power of the Federal Government over such election in a practical sense?

Mr. OLMSTED. Of course we change the Constitution so that the people elect the Senators; of course we change it to that extent.

Mr. SHERLEY. But do not we also by that change actually enlarge the power that the Federal Government has as to the election of Senators?

Mr. OLMSTED. The power remains precisely the same.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the language of the power remains the same, but the application of that power under certain circumstances is so different as to enlarge the power.

Mr. OLMSTED. Changing from the legislature to the people, of course, provides different circumstances to which the same power will apply.

Mr. SHERLEY. And does not that practically serve to enlarge that power?

Mr. OLMSTED. It does not enlarge it at all. You bring certain conditions within that power, and why not?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is a different question. I am challenging the gentleman's statement that there is no change of power.

Mr. OLMSTED. There is no change of power whatever. You bring other conditions and other circumstances within the application of that same power. Why should not there be the same power? These two bodies are coordinate bodies; they have the same powers; they exercise the same authority. The Members are all Members of the Congress; they are all Federal officers; why should not the Federal Government have power to regulate, when it may be necessary to regulate, the election of its own officers? Why should it not continue to have the same power?

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman's argument is correct, why should not the same power exist as to electors that elect the President and Vice President of the United States?

Mr. OLMSTED. Perhaps it should.

Mr. BARTLETT. But it does not.

Mr. OLMSTED. When an amendment to the Constitution shall be submitted touching that point, we will consider it, but we are are not discussing it now. It is not involved in this pending resolution.

In my judgment it is absolutely essential that the power now conferred by the Constitution upon Congress shall continue to exist. Upon that point perhaps no better or higher authority can be found or better reason given than is contained in the language of distinguished Justices of the Supreme Court in the cases to which I shall refer. In ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., 371) the Supreme Court of the United States had before it in habeas corpus proceedings the case of a man who had been found guilty of stuffing a ballot box in Maryland, in the city of Baltimore. He had been convicted under an act of Congress. The Supreme Court sustained the conviction and found that under section 4 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States Congress had power to pass the statutes in question touching the election. Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking of the statutes passed by Congress upon the subject, said:

> They relate to elections of Members of the House of Representatives, and were an assertion on the part of Congress of a power to pass laws for regulating and superintending said elections, and for securing the purity thereof and the rights of citizens to vote thereat peaceably and without molestation. It must be conceded to be a most important power and of a fundamental character. In the light of recent history and of the violence, fraud, corruption, and irregularity which have frequently prevailed at such elections it may easily be conceived that the exertion of the power, if it exists, may be necessary to the stability of our frame of government.

The right to vote for Senators or Representatives in Congress is not and can not be derived from State authority. It is derived from the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think he is accurate in stating the Supreme Court decided that the right to exercise the franchise to vote even for Members of Congress was derived from the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. OLMSTED. The court did say it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Where?

Mr. OLMSTED. And it does not require any argument to show it. Can any man vote for Senators of the United States now? No. How can he get that right? Through an amendment to the Constitution, and in no other way.

The people can not vote for Senators now; they will derive that right only from an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Senators as well as Representatives are very important functionaries of the United States. One very important branch of the Government can not be carried on without them. As declared by the Supreme Court in the Yarbrough case (110 U. S., 651):

> The right to vote for Members of Congress is fundamentally based upon the Constitution of the United States and was not intended to be left within the exclusive control of the States.

Why should we now so amend the Constitution as to leave it within the exclusive control of the States? Was there ever any Government on earth having legislative officers which did not retain control of the power to regulate the elections? [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the gentleman to say that the Supreme Court had decided that a man has the right to vote for a Member of Congress.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; except as that right is conferred by the Constitution. The State prescribes the qualifications of voters for the most numerous branch of the State legislature. The Constitution provides that persons possessing those qualifications may vote for Representatives in Congress. The State could not confer that right. I am unable to extend in the short time that I have the courtesy that I would like to extend to the gentleman for further interruption.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thought I had permission to interrupt, or I would not have done so.

Mr. OLMSTED. I did give the permission, but I find that I can not yield further now.

Mr. BARTLETT. I maintain the gentleman can not find any such law.

Mr. OLMSTED. The reasons why Congress must have power to regulate elections are forcibly stated by Mr. Justice Miller, who delivered the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court in the Yarbrough case, wherein he said:

> That a Government whose essential character is republican, whose executive head and legislative body are both elective, whose most numerous and powerful branch of the legislature is elected by the people directly, has no power by appropriate laws to secure this election from the influence of violence, of corruption, and of fraud, is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention and demand the gravest consideration. If this Government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, it must have the power to protect the elections, on which its existence depends, from violence and corruption. If it has not this power, it is left helpless before the two great natural and historical enemies of all republics, open violence and insidious corruption.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to do so, but the time is so short that I trust the gentleman will excuse me.

And, again, Mr. Justice Miller, in the same case, said—and I commend these words to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]:

> But it is not correct to say that the right to vote for a Member of Congress does not depend on the Constitution of the United States. The office, if it be properly called an office, is created by that Constitution and by that alone. It also declares how it shall be filled, namely, by election. * * * It is not true, therefore, that electors for Members of Congress owe their right to vote to the State law in any sense which makes the exercise of the right to depend exclusively on the law of the State.

And he concludes his opinion in these terms:

> It is as essential to the successful working of this Government that the great organisms of its executive and legislative branches should be the free choice of the people as that the original form of it should be so. In absolute governments, where the monarch is the source of all power, it is still held to be important that the exercise of that power shall be free from the influence of extraneous violence and internal corruption.
> In a republican government like ours, where political power is reposed in representatives of the entire body of the people, chosen at short intervals by popular elections, the temptations to control these elections by violence and by corruption is a constant source of danger.

[Applause.]

> Such has been the history of all republics, and, though ours has been comparatively free from both these evils in the past, no lover of his country can shut his eyes to the fear of future danger from both sources.
> If the Government of the United States has within its constitutional domain no authority to provide against these evils, if the very sources of power may be poisoned by corruption or controlled by violence and outrage, without legal restraint, then, indeed, is the country in danger; and its best powers, its highest purposes, the hopes which it inspires and the love which enshrines it are at the mercy of the combinations of those who respect no right but brute force, on the one hand, and unprincipled corruptionists on the other.

In the celebrated McCullough case, Chief Justice Marshall said:

> No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Federal Government on the governments of the States for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends.

This is the first attempt to make the Government of the United States dependent entirely upon the will of the States. If there is reason for the existence of power in Congress touching the election of members of one branch of the law-making body, there is equal reason for its existence as to the other. There is, indeed, much more reason for congressional authority in the election of Senators than there is in the election of Representatives. It may be seldom necessary to exercise it as to either, but the time may come when it will be necessary to exercise it as to both. The Constitution was not made for a day, and amendments are not made for a day.

Let me show to gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber what Mr. Madison, speaking in the Virginia convention, gave as the reason for the adoption of section 4, Article I of the Federal Constitution. These are his words:

> It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these (times, places, and manner) in the first places to the State governments as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised.

"Easily dissolved." Is that the position in which gentlemen desire to place the General Government?

Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber really and honestly desire to bring about the election of Senators by the people, let them not attempt to burden that proposition with an entirely different matter. Let them be content to amend section 3 of the Constitution without attempting to amend section 4.

How many States would ratify a proposition to amend section 4 alone? How many States would ratify a separate proposition to take away from Congress the power now vested in it by the Constitution to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Federal offices? Very few, if any. How many States desiring to secure to the people the right to vote for United States Senators would fail to ratify a proposition to give them that right, merely because it did not at the same time take away the power which now exists in Congress to alter or amend regulations for Federal elections? Not one. But many States would be unwilling to ratify any amendment depriving Congress of the power it now possesses in that regard. Leave section 4 alone. Do not touch the power which now exists in Congress to act, as the necessity shall arise in such way as to secure and protect that freedom, fairness, and purity of elections, in which lies the safety of the Republic. Leave untouched that authority, the very existence of which in the Constitution serves to prevent the necessity for its exercise. Concur in this Senate amendment and there will not be a dozen votes in this House against the adoption of this resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] for his construction of what is known as the Bristow amendment. The original amendment does not add to or take away from the Constitution, as to the election of United States Senators, the power to review their election if the Bristow amendment was eliminated altogether. Section 5 of the Constitution, which it is not proposed to amend, reads as follows:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

The construction put upon that provision of the Constitution has always enabled the body itself to determine the right of any person elected, or purporting to be elected thereto, to have the seat. Now, the Bristow amendment, if adopted, would provide a means for a dangerous precedent to be set. It is a step in the direction of taking from the people of the several States the right to conduct their own elections. It means the transfer of power from the States themselves to the General Government, a proposition that is dangerous within itself. It would give ample foundation for striking down powers now exercised by the States and transferring it to the National Government.

By the provisions of the Bristow amendment the elections of the several States might be held at a different time from the general elections of those States and under different election laws and by different election machinery. The expenses of the elections to be borne by the States could therefore be multiplied upon the people of the several States. It takes from them the right, if Congress sees fit, to hold their elections as they may desire and the right to hold them at the time that they hold other elections. Now, the purpose of the Bristow amendment is plain. It is not offered in the interest of the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, but it is offered for the purpose of preventing an election by a direct vote of the people of the several States—for the purpose of defeating the movement. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Certain States in the Union are opposed to the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. A great majority of the States—but perhaps not three-fourths of them—are in favor of the election of the United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. These States which are not in favor of it as an original proposition are advocating this amendment, with the hope of securing the aid of other States which fear the effect of this amendment to join them in refusing to ratify this amendment; and that is the purpose of the Bristow amendment, and the only purpose of it. If by the adoption of this amendment to the proposed measure they hope to secure by indirection what they are unable to accomplish by direction, they hope, by incorporating it into the proposition, that it will drive certain States against its ratification and thereby defeat its ultimate adoption by three-fourths of the States and therefore never become an amendment to the Constitution.

Our action, therefore, becomes the more important, not because of what we do but because of its future effect upon the result of this important question.

Now, what does it mean? It means to defer this proposition—the election of the United States Senators—if this proposition is adopted, more than a quarter of a century before the ratification by enough States to adopt the amendment will occur. It is proposed in order to have States which have had experience in Federal control of elections, because of the hardships they have had to bear under such procedure, to register their disapproval of this amendment and join with the other States that are opposed to it as an original proposition.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield three more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Speaker, it resolves itself into this kind of a proposition: The Democratic Party stands, as a party, in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. If this amendment, the Bristow amendment, is adopted, it means the defeat of that proposition or the postponement of it for at least a quarter of a century. It endangers its success when referred to the people for ratification. Why? There are certain interests in this country, as every man knows, opposed to the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, because they can manipulate the election of these Senators under present conditions and continue their control in one of the great legislative bodies of the United States. Numerous illustrations might be given. The present method of electing Senators is destroying the influence and the integrity of one of the great legislative bodies of the United States. It is minimizing its influence and disparaging its influence with the people. It is taking away the confidence of the people in the action of that body, and that has been done because of the manner in which elections of United States Senators have been made in the last 20 years.

We have an illustration to-day before that body. The State of Colorado has only one Senator in the United States Senate to-day. If they had had a direct election by the people, that question could have been settled at the ballot box and not by a legislature tying up the election for a whole session of the legislature, and now the State has only one-half of its representation in the United States Senate. It is a well-known fact that legislatures do not always reflect the will of the majority of the people of the State. Numerous examples of betrayal in this respect are familiar to us all.

This proposition when submitted to the people, in order that they might vote by ballot for their choice for United States Senators, is absolutely fair and is in keeping with the original traditions and best thought of the people who founded our institutions. Let the people control this question and not the little cliques that gather around the legislature for the purpose of manipulating the election of a United States Senator in behalf of some special interest. If you had had an election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people, much of the time and expense to the Government would not have been consumed, as it is to-day, by investigating the election of a certain Member of the United States Senate at this time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] By popular vote that kind of procedure would be eliminated and such disgraceful scandals avoided. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired again.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire to use any more time now?

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on the 12th day of last April the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, as the result of about one hour's deliberation, reported to this House two important measures: One the resolution now under discussion, for an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by a vote of the people, and, as a part of the same resolution, another amendment taking away from Congress all power to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators. The other measure was a bill for the publicity of campaign expenses.

The resolution and the bill were twin measures. The period of gestation had been brief, as I have previously explained in this House. The parturition was painless, and no one on the Democratic side of this House seems to have noticed that there was any incongruity between these two, the offspring of a common mother. No one over there seems to have noticed that they were born back to back, one looking in one direction and the other in precisely the opposite direction.

Where did Congress derive its power to pass the publicity bill? Clearly from paragraph 1 of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, which it is now proposed to amend. There is no other word or line in the Constitution upon which the power to pass the publicity bill can be based.

But this is precisely the section that the resolution seeks to have amended. The power under which Congress acted in passing the publicity bill is precisely the power that the resolution to amend the Constitution proposes to abolish so far as it relates to Senators.

So you have the novel spectacle of the committee and the House saying in the bill that it is necessary for Congress to exercise the power given by this paragraph to prevent fraud and corruption and the subtle and furtive influence of malefactors of great wealth in the election of Representatives, and saying in the resolution that those malefactors should be left entirely untrammeled by Congress to exercise that crafty, silent, corrupt influence in the election of Senators. It has been often charged on the Democratic side of the House that the Senate is the seat of the corrupt influence of wealth, the last citadel of monopoly, and in an amendment intended to make that body more directly responsive to the will of the people it is now proposed to withdraw from the election of its members every safeguard against fraud and corruption.

It will not do to say—it is not honest either with this House or with yourselves to say—that you have removed this danger when you have changed an election by the legislature for an election by the people. You know better. The position of a Senator of the United States in power and in the estimation of the people is of greater dignity than that of a Representative in Congress. It is a greater prize to struggle for. The temptation to seize it by fair means or foul is greater than in the case of a Representative. Not only does the Senate exercise equal power with this House in legislation, but the Senate must be consulted in the enactment of all treaties and the appointment of all officials named by the President. To a selfish moneyed interest, seeking to control legislation for its own benefit, a Senator is four times as great a prize as a Representative. But this Democratic House of Representatives proposes, while guarding the elections where there is least danger of corruption, to thrown down the bars entirely in the case where there is the greatest danger of corruption. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman from Michigan has spoken of the great power exercised by a Senator, and the supposed anxiety of special interests to take advantage of that power. Does not the gentleman believe it would be infinitely harder for these special interests to control the election of a Senator when that election is by the people of the State, rather than by the legislature?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I think it would be somewhat harder, and I have been in favor of that proposition, but that is not what I am discusing at this time.

Why did not some patriotic gentleman upon that side of the House point out the danger from this source to the palladium of our liberties, to the rights of the people from great combinations of capital, large employers of labor, Wall Street, Morgan, and the trusts, all seeking to capture a United States senatorship? Oh, I know that the gentleman from California gave us on this bill the first exhibition of the marvelous agility of the contortionist which our Democratic friends in this House have brought to such wonderful perfection, and which enables them on any and all occasions to talk one way and vote the other.

But it is said that the power to regulate the election of Senators has never been used. Oh, yes, that is true. Our fathers who sat in the Constitutional Convention placed many powers in the National Government which have never been exercised.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I should like to, but I have not the time. They were placed in the Constitution by a wise foresight to preserve and strengthen the Government and endow it with power to meet the exigencies of each occasion as it arose. These were beneficent powers. There let them remain, awaiting the time for their necessary exercise. Why strike any of them down?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I should like to, but I have not the time. The main argument in favor of depriving the National Government of all power to provide for or regulate the election of its own Senators was wisely placed by his party friends in the hands of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. There is no one in this House to whom I listen with greater pleasure. The clarity of his thoughts, the precision of his expression, his intellectual integrity which has often led him to differ with his party, make him interesting and instructive. And then he enjoys the distinction of being about the only Democrat of the old school remaining in this House. Gentlemen upon that side do lip service to the great name of Thomas Jefferson, but they rarely follow his teachings. The gentleman from Kentucky, however, is always faithful to the principles of the master, except where his doctrines were consumed in the furious fires of the Civil War. But the gentleman from Kentucky, it seemed to me, labored somewhat in the impossible task he had set himself of showing a good reason why Congress should continue to regulate the election of Representatives and should be shorn of its power to regulate the election of Senators. He said there should be such a distinction because Senators represented the State and were in a sense ambassadors from the State to the General Government, while Representatives in Congress represented the people. Why, the only purpose of the amendment as to the election of Senators is to do away with what little difference exists in this respect and make the Senators more directly representative of the people.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I should like to, but I have not the time. If this amendment will not have that effect, it is not worth passing.

But, sirs, there is little analogy between the functions of a Senator and those of an ambassador. Ambassadors negotiate treaties, subject to the approval of their principals. Senators alter, amend, approve, or reject treaties, and their action is final; and, in addition, they exercise equal jurisdiction with this body in legislating for 90,000,000 of people. Let us never surrender the power to keep the fount of their election pure. But gentlemen upon the other side of the House have said that the provision in this resolution which sweeps away all power to regulate the election of Senators is of little importance—they have characterized it as mere "verbiage," as "phraseology," as only a difference in words—but, thank God, one frank and truthful Democrat from the South has spoken out. The gentleman from Georgia said the other day that with this provision in the resolution he and many other Democrats on that side of the House would vote for it; that without it they would probably oppose it. Why is so much importance attached to mere verbiage? Because it is plainly seen not to be mere verbiage, but the very essence of the proposition. What has any honest man, who believes in fair elections, who wishes to see fraud and corruption at elections punished, to fear from this proposition?

The other gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] said that when Republicans insisted on the amendment offered by me—the same Bristow amendment which is now pending, to leave the power in Congress to regulate the election of Senators—he felt almost like suspecting that we were not in good faith in supporting the major proposition—the election of Senators by vote of the people—and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] just now has indorsed that choice. This is no place for crimination or recrimination, for charges or countercharges. It is a great deliberate body, for the discussion of great questions. I will say, however, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] that it is as true now as when Butler wrote the lines that—

> No man e'er felt the halter draw
> With good opinion of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I should like two minutes more.

Mr. OLMSTED. I can not yield two minutes, but I will yield one minute more.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. When gentlemen are so insistent on attaching this rider to the provision for election of United States Senators by the people, if I were as suspicious as the gentleman from Kentucky seems to be, I should almost suspect that they were inspired by desire to be free from all legal restraints in the use of money, fraud, and violence in the election of United States Senators, but I will not say I think that. I think the House should recede from its disagreement with the Senate and pass this resolution exactly as it came from that body. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in my interruption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] I asked him but one question, and that was in what way Federal authority over the election of Members of Congress had been exercised, and his answer was to require that election to be by districts. I want to say that that very answer discloses one essential objection that we have to Federal authority controlling the manner and time of election of Senators. To say that Senators should be elected from the east and west half of a State, or from this or that district of a State, might be the action taken by the Federal Government under the Bristow amendment, and that would be to destroy the very purpose of the organization of the Senate of the United States, which purpose was to have a body composed of representatives of the States to sit as ambassadors of whole and undivided States.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I have only five minutes, and I have all I can say in that time and more too.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HARDY. Furthermore, in the great State of New York, Congress might so prescribe conditions in regard to the election as to throw the election of one Senator into the city districts and the other into the rural districts, preventing the whole State from electing one or the other, so that States might come here divided against themselves, in a body intended to preserve the integrity of a State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me say that while on its face the Bristow amendment preserves the form of our Government by adhering to the letter of the Constitution, or leaving the letter there, the fact is that the Constitution now prescribes that the whole legislature, and not a section of it, shall elect a Senator; and now each Senator is an ambassador from the whole State, while the Bristow amendment might be used to divide the senatorial representatives of the State. The Bristow amendment is revolutionary, and would change the constitutional nature of one body of our National Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me state another thing. The gentleman last addressing the House [Mr. YOUNG of Michigan] said the purpose of this amendment was to do away with the distinction between the functions of a Representative and the functions of a Senator. Not at all. The function of the Representatives in this House is to represent the aggregate mass of all the consolidated people of the United States. Texas stands with Pennsylvania. Represented here, it might be in this House by a mixed delegation—it may be part Democrats and part Republicans—but in the election of a Senator the whole State acts as a unit. A Senator elected by Texas represents the whole State of Texas, and that Senator elected by Pennsylvania represents the whole State of Pennsylvania. This House represents a union of a whole people. It represents that portion of the theory of the Government in its formation which said "We are a Nation"; "we, the people of the United States." The other body represents that portion of the Government which in its foundation said "We are a confederacy of independent and sovereign States." The lapse of time and the march of history has destroyed the landmarks, to some extent, which our fathers established, but, thank God, north and south of Mason and Dixon's old line there still remains a devotion to the spirit of local self-government which caused the little State of Rhode Island to stand out of the Union for years and years, until Washington had been inaugurated, because she wanted to preserve the autonomy of her independent State organization.

And when you change, when you say that a Senator is no longer a representative of a State the equal, though his State be small, of any other Senator, though his State be large, you destroy the only principle—the foundation principle upon which our Government was divided—into an upper and lower house, as to its legislative branch. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I wish to say that the purpose of this amendment was not to change the function of a Senator, not to change his representative capacity or character, not to make him less a representative of a whole State, but to make him more truly a representative of the people of a whole State as one individual entity and autonomy. [Applause.] No other reason on earth calls for this amendment except the demand that our Senators, with all the powers, duties, and obligations contemplated by the fathers, be so elected as to truly represent the States, and the people of the States, whose servants they are.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States, in the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I thereof, provides that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. And the first paragraph of section 4 of said Article I of the Constitution provides as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Responding to a great public demand, my distinguished colleague, Mr. RUCKER, from the second district of Missouri, on the 5th day of April, 1911, introduced the following joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States, which reads as follows:

> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:
> "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.
> "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.
> "When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.
> "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution."

On a final vote in the House this joint resolution was adopted by a vote of 296 to 15.

In the Senate an amendment, proposed by Senator BRISTOW, of Kansas, was adopted as a substitute to the Rucker resolution.

The Rucker joint resolution, otherwise known as House joint resolution No. 39, contains the provision that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature.

The Bristow amendment or substitute joint resolution, passed by the deciding vote of the Vice President upon a tie vote of 44 for to 44 against, strikes that provision out, and, in all other respects, is the same as the Rucker resolution, and comes now to the House for concurrence or nonconcurrence.

The issue is clearly made.

The demand for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people of the States is general and should not be longer disregarded by Congress, and the House resolution proposed by Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, seeking to so amend the Constitution, responds to that demand by seeking to amend the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution by substituting the words "Elected by the people thereof" for and in lieu of the words "chosen by the legislature thereof," and by adding the additional words, as follows: "The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature," being the same provision as paragraph 1 of section 2 of Article I, relating to election of Members of the House of Representatives.

And the Rucker resolution seeks also to amend paragraph 1 of section 4 of Article I, so as to provide in the Constitution that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," so that Congress may not by law make or alter the regulations as to the times and manner of holding elections for Senators from that as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, placing the times and manner upon the same constitutional basis as "places of chusing Senators," which regulation by the legislature of a State can not now be interfered with by Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Bristow amendment. The effect of it, in my judgment, is to defeat the insistent demand of the people for this great reform. Fifteen Senators from Northern and Western States, after voting for the Bristow amendment, voted against the resolution as amended on its final passage, which, with the vote cast by southern Senators against the resolution because of the amendment, indicates very strongly that the joint resolution would not be ratified or adopted by three-fourths of the States. Twelve States failing to adopt would defeat the joint resolution. Five Northern States voted solidly in the Senate against the resolution on final passage, as against three Southern States. Northern Senators are more opposed to popular election of Senators than southern Senators. The Bristow amendment has evidently lessened the chance of securing this much-desired reform.

Speaking for myself, I would preserve to every State in the Union the right to elect its own United States Senators.

The effort to further centralize and extend the powers of the Federal Government has been persistent on the part of those who would lessen the power and authority of the States. Special interests and other advocates of a strong centralized government are at all times seeking to curb and lessen the power of the people. It appears in every contest where the rights of the majority of the people are involved. The encroachment of Federal authority upon the rights of the States and the people thereof should at all times be jealously watched and guarded against, to the end that too much power be not centered here at the seat of the Federal Capital or of the National Government. The interference by Federal authorities in elections in the States to the end that each State may not be allowed to elect its own United States Senators in its own way and under its own laws and regulations should not find any authority in the statutes of the Nation. The special appointment of United States marshals and other Federal officers by Federal judges, holding office for life, for the purpose of supervising State elections, should not have any sanction in the Federal laws, and the law should be so written that no Federal court could find any warrant of law for any order by which the right of any State to elect its own Senators could be interfered with.

It seems to me insistence on the Bristow amendment jeopardizes the adoption of the joint resolution. The House ought to stand by its former action. [Applause.]

If Senators are to be elected as heretofore, by the legislatures of the several States, the constitutional provision might well remain unchanged, but when a new method of electing Senators is inaugurated, to wit, election by direct vote of the people, it is logical and proper to so modify this constitutional provision as to settle the question as to what governmental authority shall safeguard the election. Who should furnish the regulation, the State that sends the two Senators to the United States Senate or the Congress that receives the credentials?

The Bristow amendment coupled with the change in the law in response to popular demand restricts and narrows the power of the States while enlarging the power of Congress. The defeat of the Bristow amendment and the passage of the original resolution unamended restricts the power of Congress by preventing Congress from passing laws regulating election of Senators.

Strong constitutional power that permits Congress to pass laws regulating the times and manner of electing Senators—with such broad power—might it not permit regulations absolutely controlling said elections and an ultimate interference in the free choice of the people when deemed necessary or desirable in the judgment of strong interests to control election of Senators by the use of Federal officials, not only at the polls but by a supervision over registration of voters and qualification of electors; not only a control of the ballot box, but even over the very enactment of laws, regulating elections, and to the nullification of State constitutions adopted by the people of the States?

The very sovereignty of the States may be involved by the action of United States district courts taking jurisdiction by reason of this very amendment, and enforcing their decrees through their especially appointed marshals and supervisors of elections. This very thought is involved in the discussions of this amendment. It is true, it is asserted by some favoring the Bristow amendment, that this power exists now under the law. It is denied by those opposing the amendment. But under the new application in the change in the method of the election of Senators, and in the light of the discussions in both the Senate and the House, might not the Federal courts settle the question of dispute against the States if the Bristow amendment prevails? The great contest in this country is between strong special interests that have long sought to dominate and control the action of State legislatures and of Congress and of the courts, and that have shown keen interest in the election of Senators, State and national, and also in the appointment of Federal judges.

The South is no more involved, in my judgment, by the Bristow amendment than any other State. The selfish interests will exercise their power and influence in the large cities and in all parts of the United States so as to place in the Senate men closely allied with them to secure legislation for their own special benefit and to defeat popular will.

The advocates of the Bristow amendment seek to shield the desires of the interests by attacking conditions in the South—obscuring the real issue—by attempts to fire the heart, obscure the judgment, and play upon the prejudices of some Members to aid them in fastening upon the country the right of the Federal Government to control the election of Senators in the interest of the money power and great corporate influences. It is true that for 124 years Congress has not availed itself of its constitutional power to pass laws regulating the times and manner of holding elections for Senators. The people have not desired during these long years that Congress should exercise this power, and now that the people of the States are about to take from the several legislatures and unto themselves the power of direct election of Senators to represent sovereign States—not special interests—in the Senate of the United States they do not want any Federal restraint or interference in their free choice of United States Senators other than the regulations provided by the laws of their own States. They would preserve the original thought of the fathers of the Republic, when the Senate was constituted of two Senators from each State to represent in that body the sovereignty of each State and the entire people thereof, regardless of the population of said State. They would preserve the integrity and sovereignty of each State and its representation in the United States Senate by retaining absolute control over their election.

The country should watch with jealous care and anxiety all attempts by the courts to usurp the rights and powers of the legislative department, and the fundamental law of the land should be so written that no court shall be able to construe away the rights of the people or write into the law unwarranted language. This day and age is fraught with apprehensions of dangerous encroachments upon the rights of the people, who, by reason of the fact that malefactors of great wealth have had undue influence in the Nation, are seeking to gain control of all branches of the Government.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have always felt that there was not and ought not to be any partisanship in the question of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. I have known that the rank and file of the people, as far as I have come in contact with them, have been in favor of this proposition for many years, and they were not confined to any one political party.

I have known that there were thousands who for various reasons opposed this change in our Federal Constitution, and that this class of people was not confined to any one political party. We are confronted, however, here to-day with practically a division along partisan lines on the question as it is presented before the House. The resolution now before this House that has passed the Senate provides simply and solely for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people.

The Constitution as now existing provides that the Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the States. In substance the resolution now before the House changes the words "chosen by the legislature" and substitutes in lieu thereof "elected by the people."

The Democratic Party in 1908 in its national platform said:

> We favor the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, etc.

In the platform of 1904 they said the same thing. In the platform of 1900 they said the same thing. It seems almost as if the Democratic platform makers had a rubber stamp and they slapped this proposition on every time they adopted a platform.

I am not speaking of it in any disrespect; it is commendatory of them; but, my friends, the day of promise has passed, the time of redemption is here. You have pledged to the people that if you had the power you would change the Constitution of the United States and make United States Senators elected by a direct vote of the people. That is the proposition that is now before the House, and a vote to concur in the Senate amendment will bring about a redemption of that pledge.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. For a question.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, the simile used by the gentleman as to the use of the rubber stamp prompts me to ask if the frequent use of that stamp has not tended a great deal to bring about the sentiment which has crystallized in the resolution now before us?

Mr. NORRIS. It may be, and you are entitled to all of the credit that actually belongs to you. I want to say, however, that the promises that have been frequently made by political parties and the redemption of those promises are two propositions. It seems to me if you have meant what you said all these years, you will vote to concur in the Senate amendment, which means the Bristow amendment, as it is spoken of here, the Senate resolution as now before us. But what is the predicament we find ourselves in? We find the Democrats who have thus far spoken have said to us, Yes; we are in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people, but we are not going to give that right to the people unless you take with it another amendment, and so you propose to couple on here an amendment of a different part of the Constitution, wherein the power to control Federal elections is vested by the Constitution in Congress; and you say, if we must have the election of Senators by the people, we are going to take with it an amendment to the Constitution that gives to the States exclusive control over the election of United States Senators.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me, as my time is very limited. It has been argued that this amendment now before the House, if adopted, would defeat the proposition. Let us see. It is a simple proposition to elect Senators by a direct vote of the people. You propose to put in its place a resolution that is identically the same, as far as it goes, but which goes further and says that the right to control elections of Senators shall be taken away from Congress and vested in the several States. I would vote for the proposition either way, but I want to submit to you, my friends, that it is not fair to put on this proposition that the people of the United States are almost unanimous for a proposition that has never been advocated at any time by any faction or put in any platform of any political party anywhere on earth. If this has something of merit in it, then why should you couple it onto this other thing which everybody admits has merit, and that practically everybody wants? There are men who honestly think that it is very damaging. I think it would be a mistake myself, but at the same time I do not look on it with the same fear that some other people honestly do. It has been said here that this can not be approved by the legislatures unless this additional amendment is tacked on. My friends, what State would refuse to approve it? The gentlemen who have made that argument have been Democrats, and have made it along partisan lines, and I want to call your attention to a fact that everybody knows to be a fact, and that is that, as a rule, the legislatures that will defeat this amendment are the Democratic legislatures, and they are going to say to the people, While we pledged to you all these years that we ought to elect Senators by a direct vote of the people, we will not give you that privilege unless you amend the Constitution at the same time in another respect. If there is any merit in this other proposition, why don't you submit it as a separate proposition and let it stand on its own bottom; let it go to the legislatures on its own merits; let it stand here in this House on its own merits. Why will you couple with the proposition to elect Senators by a direct vote of the people another amendment that nobody has asked for, at least in the open?

I do not believe there has been a political party which has held a convention and adopted a platform anywhere in the United States that ever approved that proposition. Take the Democratic platform that I have read from and all of the other Democratic national platforms, if you will read them, and not one put in the proposition to give the States control over Federal elections that you insist shall be put in here to-day. It seems to me that it reduces itself to this proposition. Everybody, practically, is in favor of an amendment to the Constitution for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. You who have the power in this House to-day either to kill or to pass that resolution are going to say to the country: You can not have that amendment unless we tack on another one, that we never discussed before, that you never discussed, and that nobody dares to stand before the people of the country on as a part of any political platform.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] said that this Bristow amendment, which is the one now before the House, was a proposition to defeat the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. I want to deny that most emphatically. It is the only genuine proposition, uncoupled and untrammeled with any other proposition, that is before this House. On the other hand, the amendment that you would add to it, a separate additional amendment to a different part of the Constitution, is one that, in my judgment, will endanger the adoption of this amendment by the legislatures of the different States, because, as I have said, many men who favor the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people will not vote to change the Constitution in the other respect and take away from the Congress the right to control the election of United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I agree fully with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. It may not be the intention of its proponents, but the result of the adoption of the Bristow amendment will be to defeat the resolution. There is not any sort of question about that. Now, I want to address myself for just a moment to the situation as I see it. This is a proposition, Mr. Speaker, to elect Senators by a direct vote of the people. As the gentleman from Kentucky has well said, Senators stand upon a different plane from Representatives in Congress. The Congress, in the first place, apportions representation among the different States. They prescribe how many Representatives a State shall have. The Constitution prescribes how many Senators a State shall have, and the Congress has never undertaken to interfere, and I question seriously whether they now have the power to interfere, in the manner and the times of the elections of Senators. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] says, or rather asks the question, Why should we couple another proposition? I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the original resolution which passed this House is the only genuine proposition providing absolutely for the election of Senators by the people that has been before this Congress. Gentlemen on the other side desire to couple it with something else. They charge us with being afraid of the people. Now, this resolution of ours is the only proposition which is designed to leave the election entirely to the people at interest. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And those gentlemen desire that Congress shall have authority and supervision over the election by the people in the different States. You are not leaving it to the people as long as you hold or attempt to hold some kind of supervision over the action of those people. A Senator comes from a State; he is an ambassador; he represents the State in its entity. The State is a sovereignty which Senators represent at the other end of this Capitol.

Now we propose to take the election away from the legislature and put it directly in the hands of the people of the different States to elect their own Senators, and you propose, although you say you are willing for that to be done, that although the people may have the right to elect, yet you insist that you, a body sitting here in Washington, in the Capital of the Nation, shall reserve to yourself the right to say whether or not the people have been fair, whether they have been honest, whether they have been just in the election of their Senators. We propose to strip it from every outside influence; we propose to take the power away from the legislature, and to take it away from the Congress, and leave the people of those sovereign States absolutely free to elect their own Senators. If the people are corrupt, then it is the fault of the people, not ours; and if the people of the different States are so corrupt that they can not hold an election for United States Senator without that election be tainted with fraud, then your Government is a failure, and a failure now. So that I say, Mr. Speaker, that instead of our undertaking to attach something to this to deprive the people of absolute power, the Bristow amendment proposes to do that and to give another, a foreign body, a body entirely removed from the State, removed from the people, surveillance or jurisdiction or censorship over their acts in the election of their own Senators.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. It goes further than that. It vests the power in Congress to pass the election law by which the election shall be held; it goes further than supervising.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Undoubtedly; and goes further than the power given now, because they can not pass laws to regulate the election of members of the legislature who, under the present system, elect the Senator. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON].

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the question before the House, it is this: That the resolution for the election of Senators by the people, as passed by this House, provided that the time, the places, and the manner for the people to elect their Senators should be provided by the legislatures. That resolution, as it passed the Senate, as it now pends under this motion before the House, strikes out that provision and leaves the power to regulate the time and the manner of holding the election for United States Senators ultimately in the Congress of the United States. And for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to it. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States should have the power to determine the time, the place, and the manner for a State to elect its Senators. Why should it so determine? Does the Congress of the United States know better, and can it determine with greater wisdom the time when Mississippi shall elect her Senators? Do the Members of this House from other States think that they have so much better knowledge of the local conditions existing in our State and of the conveniences of our people that they could vote in this House more intelligently to determine the time and the manner of electing our Senators than we? I undertake to say that you know no more about what is best in our State than we do of what is best in your State. Now, in the very formation of the Government we see in every provision this fundamental idea: That there are certain matters which in their nature are of such general interest that the Congress of the United States can deal with them better and with greater wisdom than the people of the several States. We see that the Nation can legislate with greater wisdom on matters that affect our foreign relations, on matters that affect our interstate commerce, and on every matter of that kind which is of general interest; and for that reason the framers of our Government in their wisdom have committed all such matters to the Congress. On the other hand, there are a great many matters of local interest where the wise and best solutions of the questions that arise out of them can be made with more wisdom by a local government, and that is the foundation of the doctrine of local self-government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The value of local self-government lies in the fact that the people of any community have so much deeper interest in their local affairs and so much better knowledge of local conditions that they are able to enact better laws to regulate their affairs than it is possible for those to enact who live in distant States. For this reason the people of each State in the Union reserved to itself in the formation of the Federal Government the right to regulate everything of a local nature. The protecton of life, liberty, and property within the State, the question of public education, the maintenance of benevolent institutions, the enforcement of the criminal laws, the construction and maintenance of public highways, and the enactment, interpretation, and execution of laws pertaining to these and all other matters of local interest was wisely reserved within the control and jurisdiction of the State governments.

The question therefore presented by the motion to concur in the Senate amendment is whether the determination of the time and manner of the election of a United States Senator by a State is a matter of local interest, like the establishment of a common school, like the punishment of a murderer, like the maintenance of an asylum for the insane, about which the people of other States would know nothing and have but little concern, and should therefore be intrusted to the State government; or is the determination of the time and manner of electing Senators like a treaty between a foreign government and our own, like the regulation of interstate commerce or like the coinage of money, in which all the people of the Union have the same identical interest, and which is therefore best intrusted to a common government? Every State in the Union is deeply interested in who shall be the Senators of every other State, because the Senators of every other State must participate in the enactment of the laws pertaining to matters in which each State has, together with all others, a common interest, and therefore the Democrats of the House without a single dissenting vote have passed the resolution to amend the Constitution so as to take from the legislature of each State the power to elect the Senators from such and to intrust that power to the people thereof. The value of this change lies in the fact that the wisdom, virtue, and patriotism of the people of a State will result in the selection of Senators who will serve the people better and enact better laws than could be expected from Senators chosen by the legislatures. The bribery, the scandal, and the shame which has resulted from the intrusting of this power to the legislatures, and the servile fidelity of those elected by legislatures to the special interests of those whose money and power had influenced their election in the legislatures fully justifies the wisdom of this change in the organic law. The proposed change in the Constitution will give to the people of each State not only the right to choose their own Senators, but the guaranty that the honesty and intelligence of the people of every other State will be exercised in choosing its Senators.

While this change in the organic law is a matter of common and universal interest, and while each State is so deeply interested in the selection of all the Senators, yet no State has any sort of interest or concern in either the time or manner of electing Senators in the other States. The time and manner in which the Senators from Mississippi are elected is of no interest or concern to the people of Maine, nor do the people of Mississippi care when or how the people of Indiana elect their Senators.

The time at which the people of Mississippi should elect their Senators presents a question of local convenience in which no other State has any interest. Being engaged mostly in agriculture, it suits the welfare of the people of Mississippi best to hold their elections in July and August, between the end of the cultivation and the beginning of the harvest of their crops, and since no other State has any concern in the time of their elections, the control of the time is not a matter in which any other State should have a voice. It seems to suit the people of other States to hold their elections at different seasons of the year, and therefore Mississippi should have no voice in fixing the time for them. When the time for electing Senators is fixed by the laws of the State it can be so arranged as to have the election of Senators, Congressmen, and State and county officers all at the same time and thus save a great deal of expense to the people, but if Congress should fix the time of holding elections for Senators it would have to fix the same time in all the States, and thus fasten upon the people a double and useless expense.

The manner of electing Senators is purely local and should be left to the States. If any State in the Union should elect two men to represent it in the Federal Senate no other State could have the slightest interest in the manner of such election. The Constitution of the United States prescribes the qualifications for Senators, and if the chosen Senators from any State have the prescribed qualifications it should not matter what the manner of election was.

But it is urged that the time and manner of electing Senators is a matter of common interest and national concern, and that Congress should control it, because it is necessary to the preservation of the Federal Government. This I deny. The true theory of the Federal Government is maintained by leaving the entire selection of Senators to the States. The Federal Constitution was largely a compromise between the advocates of a strong centralized Government and the friends of State rights, and one of the most prominent and important of all the concessions to the sovereignty of the States was the provision that each State should be represented in the Federal Senate by two Senators, without regard to population, thus putting all the States on an equality. The idea was that each State should have the same power in the Senate and that its two Senators should represent the State. It is in perfect accord with this idea that the State should elect its Senators in its own time and manner. If Congress can determine the time and manner of electing Senators, and the time and manner fixed by Congress does not suit the State, then, in so far as the time and manner of the election is concerned, the Senators elected contrary to the time and manner desired by the State and in accordance with the will of Congress will represent not the State, but the National Government.

If the Senators should represent the National Government in its will as to the time and manner of their election, then we will have taken one step toward their representation of a centralized government in all respects, and instead of preserving the Federal Government in its integrity, the object and effect of the Bristow amendment is to destroy the very nature of the Federal Government in so far as it is affected by the time and manner of electing Senators. One of the great political evils of the day is the fact that too many Members of the Senate represent, not the will of the people, but the will of their masters who dominate a subservient legislature to secure their election, and the very object of the proposed amendment to the Constitution is to remedy this evil. It is therefore illogical to concur in the Bristow amendment, which provides that Senators from a State may not represent the will of the people of that State as to the time and manner of their election.

But the Bristow amendment is illogical, unwise, and inconsistent in that, if it be adopted, the power to fix the places of electing Senators will be vested in the State governments, and the time and manner of their election in the Federal Government. This will necessitate two systems of laws, one of which must be enacted by the States to determine the places of holding the elections and the other must be enacted by Congress to determine the time and manner of the election. If the places of holding the elections for Senators is not a matter of national concern and common interest, which should therefore not be intrusted to Congress, it is impossible to conceive any reason why the time and manner of the election is not also a matter of State jurisdiction. If the will of the people of the State should prevail as to the places of electing their Senators, why should not that same will prevail as to the time and manner of the elections? If the preservation of the Federal Government does not depend upon its selection of the places of holding the senatorial elections, as the Bristow amendment concedes, how, then, can it depend upon the selection of the time and manner of the elections? But the argument is made that the Constitution, as it now stands, provides that the legislature can fix the places and Congress the time and manner of the elections. This is true, and there is some reason for it, because the elections of Senators by the legislatures, as now provided, had to take place at the capitals of the States, and it would therefore have been folly to empower Congress to provide for an election by the legislature at any other place; but when the election is transferred from the legislature to the people, there can be no good reason why the legislature should fix the places of the election, as the Bristow amendment admits it should, and not also fix the time and manner of the election.

Another fact, which demonstrates that the power to fix the time and manner of electing Senators should reside in the people of a State is that, while the Congress has from the beginning of the Government had the ultimate power to determine the time, places, and manner of electing Representatives, yet it has for more than an hundred years permitted the States to exercise it. The fact that the Congress has for such a long time acquiesced in the exercise of this power by the States, and that each State has provided for the time and manner of electing its representatives, is a confession of the Federal and State governments that the power can be exercised with greater wisdom and to the best advantage by the States and not by the Congress. The wisdom of the rule that the States should control the time, place, and manner of elections is forcibly illustrated and emphasized by the only exceptions to the rule, which were in the dark days of reconstruction and force bills, when, dominated by sectional hate and bitter partisanship, the Republican Party assumed control of the elections of the South and destroyed local self-government, substituting the rule of ignorance and vice for that of intelligence and virtue, and with the point of Federal bayonets fastening the heel of the negro upon the neck of the white man.

But it is urged that the Bristow amendment should become a part of the Constitution because, while the Congress has never exercised its power to control the election of Representatives except in the period of reconstruction, yet it has always exercised that power as to the time and manner of election of Senators. This is a mistake. While section 14 of the Revised Statutes does provide that the legislature shall on the second Tuesday after it convenes proceed to elect the Senator, yet this does not fix the time, because the State determines when the legislature shall convene. The fact that section 14 does not fix the time of electing Senators is demonstrated by the fact that no two States elect their Senators at the same time. There is hardly a month in the year in which some State does not elect its Senators, and this great difference in the times of the election is the result of each State determining for itself when it will elect its Senators, and shows that even when Congress attempts to fix the time, as it did in section 14, it can not do so, but the time of the election varies and changes according to the will of the State.

But it is also urged that the Congress has exercised the power to provide for the manner of electing Senators in the legislature. The manner in which the legislature shall elect the Senators, as provided in section 15 of the Revised Statutes, is harmless and unimportant, because no manner that could be devised for the election by a fixed and definite body, over whose numbers and membership Congress has no control, could possibly affect the result or change the choice of the person elected. An election of the Senator by the people is a radically different proposition, in which the control of the manner could be and would be exercised to determine the choice, and the very fact that Congress has exercised its power to control the manner of the election of Senators by the legislature, which manner could not in the nature of the election affect the result, and that it has failed to control the manner of the election of Representatives by the people where the control of the manner would affect the result is an irresistible argument to show that the wisdom of Congress, as manifested in the whole history of the country, favors the jurisdiction of the State over the manner of popular elections, and is a historic condemnation by Congress of the Bristow amendment.

It is therefore clear that the Congress throughout the history of the country has always deemed it best to leave the selection of the time and manner of Federal elections to the States, except during the very period when above all others it should have done so, and that was when partisanship had dethroned reason and sectional hate had supplanted patriotism and brotherly love. And the very motive now behind the insistence that the power to control the time and manner of Federal elections should be reserved in the Congress is the hope of the Republican Party that the dark day may return when the happy reunion and widespread affection which now binds every section of the Union together will give place to such sectional ill will and hostility that public sentiment at the North will sustain that party in again overthrowing southern civilization. The exhibition of ill will to the South and the repeated flings at our section that have come from the Republican side of the House all through the debate at this session of Congress is sufficient assurance that this party still has the disposition to overthrow local self-government in the South, and has been deterred from doing so by public sentiment in the North. And while I confidently believe that this public sentiment and sectional good will is now and always will be sufficient protection to the people of the South, yet I can not support the Bristow amendment to the resolution, since its only object and purpose is, as I believe, to enable the Republican Party to destroy southern civilization whenever sectional conditions may so change that it can gratify its malignant feelings toward the South without danger of being turned out of office. It seems, therefore, that both the rule of inaction on the part of Congress throughout the entire history of the country, permitting the States to control Federal elections, and the lamentable exception to that rule both demonstrate the wisdom of vesting the States with the power to regulate the time and manner, as well as the places, of holding senatorial elections.

But it is said that Congress should have the power to determine the time and manner of holding senatorial elections, because it has the power with reference to the election of Representatives. This contention is based on the idea that there is some virtue and advantage in making the power of Congress the same in both cases. Even if this were a sound argument, it would be inapplicable to the Bristow amendment, which does not propose to give the Congress the same power with reference to the election of Senators which it has with reference to the election of Representatives, for the Congress can control the time, places, and manner of electing Representatives, while the Bristow amendment proposes to give the Congress power to control only the time and manner, and to leave the State the power to control the places of the election of the Senators.

The provision of the Constitution with reference to the election of the Representatives, whether wise or unwise, is at least logical, consistent, and sensible, being based on the fact that the same government, whether the Federal or State government, should control the time, place, and manner of election, while the Bristow amendment is illogical, inconsistent, and senseless in making a useless and unreasonable division of the same election by committing the place of the election to the jurisdiction of the State and the time and manner to the Federal Government.

But the argument that the provisions with reference to the election of Senators and Representatives should be the same is not only inapplicable but is unsound. The fact that the Congress has the power to control the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives is a strong reason why it should not also have the power to control the time and manner of electing Senators, because if the Congress should ever again exercise that power so that the Congressmen from a State would not represent the sentiment and will of the people of the State, then there should be a constitutional guaranty that the State could, at least, choose its Senators at such time and in such manner that its sentiment and will should have some expression in one branch of the Congress at least. There is no escape from this conclusion, except to those who may desire that in certain contingencies the will of the people should be wholly disregarded, and that the present union of the States shall become a great empire in which the Members of both branches of Congress shall represent not the will of the people but the will of the Government.

If, therefore, as I have shown, the people of a State can more wisely determine the time and manner of electing its Senators because it has a deeper interest and better knowledge of local conditions than the Congress; if, as I have shown, the time and manner of electing Senators is not a matter of common concern, but of local interest and a part of local self-government; if, as I have shown, the committing to the State of the power to determine the time and manner, as it now has the constitutional right to determine the places of the election, would save expense and trouble and promote the public convenience; if, as I have shown, the determination of the time and manner of electing Senators carries out the fundamental theory of our Government that the two Senators from a State should represent its wishes, its sentiment, its will and welfare, and not the will, wishes, and sentiment of the Federal Government; if, as I have shown, it is illogical and without reason that the matter of the election should be so divided that the State will have jurisdiction over the places and the Congress over the time and manner of senatorial elections; if, as I have shown, the failure of Congress from the beginning of our history to fix the time and manner of Federal elections, except in times of great sectional excitement and partisanship, is an admission that the determination of the question had better be left to the control of the States; if, in short, as I have shown, every consideraion of reason, policy, and convenience, expense, and theory favors the jurisdiction of the State over the time and manner of elections of Senators, and if there is no sound reason why the Congress should have the jurisdiction, the question arises why is the Republican Party, both in the House and in the Senate, so determined that the people of the State should not control the time and manner of electing Senators? And why has this party made such a long and vigorous fight to tack the Bristow amendment to the resolution for the popular election of Senators? Why so much vehemence and feeling manifested on the Republican side to retain the power to fix the time and manner of electing Senators?

No explanation can be obtained by a consideration of the subject of the contention. To the ordinary mind it would seem that the mere time and manner of an election is a matter of little importance, and does not merit the great consideration that it has received. It would seem to one who only looks upon the surface and fails to discover what is concealed beneath, that it is utterly immaterial whether the State or the Federal Government fixes the time and manner of the election. If a State can elect a Senator to represent it at one time and can also elect the same person as Senator at a different time, it is true that the question of the time would amount to nothing whichever government might fix it; and if the State can elect the same person as Senator in a manner determined by the State as in a manner fixed by the Congress, then the manner would be immaterial. It is plain, therefore, that there is a deeper significance involved in the question than appears on the surface. There is something more important than the mere time and manner of the election which has aroused such determined effort on the part of the Republican Party. Under the fraudulent pretense of controlling the time and manner of electing Senators, the real purpose and object of the Republican leaders is to determine who shall be the Senators from the Southern States. Instead of Senators who will represent the sentiment, views, and will of the southern people, the Republican leaders would like to have southern Senators, as they once did, who would represent the will of the Republican Party, and who will be the pliant tools of the trusts and monopolies, which are the masters of the Republican Party and which furnish the money to keep that party in power for their selfish ends. The accomplishment of this purpose finds its possibility, and the danger in the whole proposition lies in the ambiguity of the two words "people" and "manner." The friends of the Bristow amendment tell us that it really works no change in the Constitution, that the provision now is that the Senators shall be chosen by the legislature, and that the Bristow amendment only substitutes for the word "legislature" the word "people." But right here lies the danger. The word legislature is a fixed, unambiguous term, describing a body composed of a certain number of men elected by the people of the State. The Congress has no jurisdiction over the election of members of the State legislature, and if the legislature fails to elect Senators who represent the will of the people of the State, the people have the power to turn their legislators out of office and to replace them with men who will respect the popular will, as they often do. But the word "people," which the Bristow amendment substitutes for the word "legislature," is an uncertain, ambiguous term. It is sometimes used to include children as well as adults, women as well as men, unregistered as well as registered voters, and when we say that the people shall elect Senators, then whichever government, whether the State or the Federal, has the power to determine the manner of an election must determine what classes constitute the people. Under the present law of Mississippi, the people who have the right to elect officers are the men 21 years of age who can read the Constitution, or understand it when read to them, and who have paid their taxes on or before the first day of February in the year in which they seek to vote, and who have not been convicted of certain crimes, and who have registered four months before the election. These classes of men constitute the people of Mississippi as determined by the legislature of the State, but the real object of the Bristow amendment is to let Congress determine who shall be included in the word "people." And the leaders of that party would like to determine that every negro in Mississippi, whether he has paid his taxes or not, whether he can read the Constitution or not, whether he is a criminal or not, and whether he is a registered voter or not, is a part of the "people" and shall have the right to vote.

The object of the Bristow amendment is to wrest the political power of Mississippi and every other Southern State from the virtue and intelligence of the people and vest it in the ignorant and vicious class of the State. In short, the object is to destroy the civilization of the South, and instead of southern representation in the Congress of the United States they aim ultimately at the overthrow of local self-government in the South and the selection of the tools of monopoly and trust to sit in the House and Senate as representatives of Southern States. Whenever this object is accomplished and the Senators from the Southern States cease to represent the will of the people of those States, but represent the will of the Republican Party, then the Union of the States shall have been destroyed and converted into an empire, in which the voice of the people amounts to nothing.

The accomplishment of the real object of the Bristow amendment will be facilitated also by the uncertainty and ambiguity of the word "manner." What does the manner of the election mean? Does it include the registration of the voters? If so, then the Government which has the jurisdiction to fix the manner must provide for the registration, and hence determine who are qualified to be registered. Does it include the appointment of the clerks and managers? If so, then the Government which controls the manner must appoint the managers and clerks of the election. Does the manner of the election include the determination and declaration of the result of the election? If so, then the Government having control of the manner must decide who has been elected. It is therefore clear to my mind that the whole object of the Bristow amendment is to deprive the State of the power to determine who shall represent it in the Senate, and to give to Congress the power to determine and select Senators of the Southern States.

The danger to Southern civilization in this unrighteous amendment would not be half so great if the American people were divided into two national parties. But the Republican Party is a sectional party. It was organized as a sectional party, and it has never had any existence in the South, and never will have. The hearts of its leaders are filled with bias, prejudice, and hate toward the southern people, and all through the debates in this very Congress they have given full expression to their ill will toward the people of the South. And just as long as there is a possibility of this sectional South-hating party having control of the Federal Government, just so long will I oppose giving the Congress the power to interfere with elections in the South.

It is perfectly clear that the ground of Republican contention in the Bristow amendment is to overthrow white supremacy and to reinstate negro domination in the Southern States. The Republican position, clearly expressed throughout the debate, full of malignant tirades against the South, and breathing the bitterness of hate toward the southern people, does not even pretend to limit the operation of the Bristow amendment to the control of the time and manner of the election throughout the Union, but boldly warn us that the object and aim of the amendment is negro rule in the South, is Federal interference with southern elections, is Federal compulsion of what is denominated honest and fair elections in the South. The Republican Party not only avows its regret that it has heretofore been too lenient in not overthrowing local self-government in the South, but avows its purpose, under the Bristow amendment, to usurp control of southern elections whenever necessary to preserve the progressive civilization of the day.

If one-half the reports in circulation are true, and if the statements of Republican and northern Senators correctly describe the political situation, then the very center of the unfairness, dishonesty, and corruption in senatorial elections has not been in the South, but in those very Northern States in which the Republican Party raise the cry of dishonest and unfair elections in the South in order to divert attention from its own shame. The very ground of the well-nigh universal demand throughout the North for the popular election of Senators is the bribery and the corruption which has been practiced in northern legislatures by the trusts and monopolies which dominate and control the Republican Party, and surely this party of corruption and vice should be silent about the elections in the South.

But by honest and fair southern elections is not meant elections free from bribery and corruption on the part of the corporate masters of the Republican Party, but the term "honest and fair elections" is used to describe southern elections in which ignorant and criminal negroes are used to control southern elections, as was once done under Republican misrule. In other words, the purpose of the Bristow amendment, as interpreted by the Republican Party, is not merely to have the Congress determine the time and manner of the election, but to give the General Government jurisdiction to enforce such elections in the South as the sectional South-hating Republican Party may call honest and fair, and thereby, under the false pretense of controlling the time and manner of southern elections, to secure elections in which ignorant and vicious negroes shall be the managers and clerks and in which a negro majority shall be counted.

The entire drift of the debate on the Republican side shows that negro domination of southern elections is the ultimate aim of the Bristow amendment. The love of the Republican Party for the negro is the rankest hypocrisy. The iniquitous system of taxation by which the fruits of the negro's toil, as well as of the southern white man, have been legislated into the coffers of the monopolies and trusts of the country shows that the Republican Party only loves him to rob him. In the whole Republican organization there is not as much real affection for the negro as you can find in one southern white family. We know that the welfare of the negro as well as that of the white man forbids that he should again, under the guidance of the Republican carpetbaggers, ruin the Southern States, and we therefore oppose the Bristow amendment, which aims at such disastrous results.

But the Bristow amendment is not made in good faith. It is not proposed because it is believed that the Federal Government can more wisely determine the time and manner of an election in a State than the State can do. The object of the amendment is not to improve and better the law, but it is a scheme to defeat the popular election of Senators. Those who oppose the popular election of Senators all favor the Bristow amendment. The real idea of the Republican Party is the same old Hamiltonian idea that the people are incompetent and unfit to rule, and that a strong centralized government is necessary to compel the people to submit to the will of the government. In every State where this idea is dominant, the legislature will refuse to ratify the amendment for the popular election of Senators, and the scheme of these enemies of the people was to so change the resolution by the Bristow amendment as to threaten southern civilization with negro rule and thereby force the Southern States to join the Republican enemies of the people in Northern States where that party still has control and defeat and kill the proposition for popular senatorial elections. This unrighteous scheme will certainly be successful if the Bristow amendment is adopted, and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I oppose it.

In conclusion, the question presented by the Bristow amendment is apparently not whether it is best and wisest that the State or the Congress shall control the time and manner of senatorial elections but really whether southern Senators shall represent the will of the people of those States or the will of a partisan majority in Congress. The practical importance of this question in the past became apparent when the Republican Party overthrew local self-government in the South and established negro supremacy in order to perpetuate itself in power.

The patriotic sentiment of the North and the sectional affection that now binds every part of the Union together has for many years restrained the Republican Party from a repetition of its hostile interference with the election laws of the South, but the strong effort to fasten the Bristow amendment on the resolution for the popular election of Senators, and the expressions of the Republican leaders of their hatred of the South and of their infatuation for negro rule, show that the hope of again destroying southern civilization is still cherished in their hearts. The time when they dream of accomplishing this purpose is indicated in the avowal that the Federal Government should exercise the power given it by the Bristow amendment whenever it shall become necessary to the preservation of our progressive civilization. It is a civilization in which the Republican Party has exercised every function of the Government to legislate the wealth of the country from the masses who produce it into the pockets of the classes who enjoy it. It is a civilization in which year by year the rich are made richer and the poor are made poorer by unjust legislation. It is a civilization in which half of the American people own no property and the number of paupers are increasing and the number of millionaires and multimillionaires are multiplying under the operation of the class legislation of the Republican Party. This civilization is called progressve. It is growing from bad to worse. And the great issue of American politics is whether this civilization, as it is called, shall progress still further or shall be changed—whether injustice in legislation shall be continued or abandoned. It is an issue between the masses and the classes, between the people and plutocracy. And when the last final struggle comes, when it is finally decided whether the people or the plutocrats shall govern the country, it is the dream of Republicanism, as openly expressed, under the necessity of preserving this progressive civilization, to overthrow local self-government in the South and to use the poor deluded negro to overthrow and destroy the rights of the American people and to establish forever the reign of plutocracy in American politics. When that awful day comes, then the preservation of the rights of the American people in every Northern State will need southern Senators who represent the will of the southern people instead of Senators who represent the will of the favored classes, who dominate and control the Republican Party.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the resolution originally adopted by the House proposes two distinct and disconnected amendments to the Constitution. The one providing for the election of United States Senators by the people, without the intervention of State legislatures, and the other depriving Congress of all power of supervision over these elections.

The Bristow amendment to the House resolution eliminates the provisions to abrogate Federal control of the senatorial elections and confines the proposition to the one subject, namely, to amend the Constitution of the United States so that the people of the several States may vote directly for United States Senators.

The proposition to concur in the Senate amendment which is now before us affords the opportunity to limit the proposed amendment to one subject. I am in favor of concurring in that amendment.

Mr. Speaker, however we may differ respecting either the advisability or the legality of the present proposition, there is one thing upon which I think both sides of this House will be agreed, namely, that we are now engaged in one of the most important functions conferred upon us by the Constitution. We are exercising the extraordinary legislative power of Congress. We are engaged in amending the Constitution of the United States. I want to call the attention of gentlemen of this House to this fact, that we are proceeding in the discharge of this important duty with what we all must admit is unseemly haste. We occupy many days in the discussion of the fiscal policy of the Government in the adoption of tariff measures. I think we took 10 or 15 days here for the discussion of Canadian reciprocity and a week in the discussion of the wool-tariff schedule. We are on the eve of a temporary adjournment. We have one day remaining before that time. The Members want to get away on Thursday. We have a day to fill in, and therefore we say, "All right; let us amend the Constitution of the United States." Now, that is what we are attempting to do, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], under the stress of such conditions, was obliged to deny to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] even two hours and a half to discuss this problem.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I merely want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that yesterday evening gentlemen on that side expressed the belief that an hour and a half would be ample, and I have given the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] all the time he wants.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. My statement was that under the stress of conditions like these you were obliged to do it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman always make such an interesting speech that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] can not yield enough time to him, I will yield him some time myself.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Now, gentlemen, let me consider this proposition from a different standpoint than that from which it has already been considered. I do not desire, in the little time at my command, to repeat the arguments already made and so well made. But let me recall the fact to you, gentlemen, that if we are willing to amend the Constitution under these irregular circumstances and with so much unseemly haste, the people of the United States are not willing to join with us in so serious a proposition.

Do you know that in 125 years there have been seriously proposed over 2,000 amendments to the Constitution of the United States? And do you know that the people of the United States have practically rejected every one of them. Let us consider for a moment what the people have done in the past with such propositions and the circumstances and conditions under which the existing amendments to the Constitution were adopted, and out of that consideration let us draw a line of policy to be pursued at the present time. We have, it is true, 15 amendments to the Constitution, but a consideration of the subject of those amendments and the circumstances under which they were proposed and adopted give no warrant for our present proceedings.

The first 10 amendments are almost an integral part of the Constitution itself. They are simply declarations of the old immutable principles of Magna Charta, a cautionary reservation of the rights of the States, a bill of rights.

The eleventh amendment was proposed in 1794, almost immediately after the organization of the Government, and was made to recall a portion of State sovereignty with which the States had inadvertently parted. In the recital of the judicial power of the United States there was a provision that it should extend to all suits between a State and its citizens or the citizens of a foreign State; and in the early case of Chisholm against Georgia, Justice Jay declared that under the Constitution a State could be brought to the bar of the court at the instance of a citizen of a State. Then the people of the United States said, "We never intended to do this and inadvertently parted with a part of our sovereignty," and they proceeded to amend the Constitution to recall that power.

Later on the people found that the method employed for the election of the President and Vice President, as provided in the third paragraph of the first section of Article II, was cumbersome and defective, and in the twelfth amendment they simply amended a part of the machinery of the Government at the demand of the people of the United States, and this constitutes the twelfth amendment. You all know that the thirteenth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth amendments grew out of conditions that were revolutionary, when the liberation of the colored race from slavery created conditions with which the States were unable to cope, and it became necessary to protect their rights by a series of constitutional amendments. It will be seen, therefore, that all of these changes grew out of the acknowledged inadequacy of the Constitution and were made in obedience to the intelligent demand of the people or of the States themselves for a change in the organic law to meet these demonstrated conditions.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are confronting a proposition to-day that this country never heard of before; we are establishing a precedent, if you adopt this resolution without the Bristow amendment, that, in my judgment, is the most serious and dangerous precedent ever established by an American Congress. Understand, gentlemen, that the Constitution of the United States is a concession of the power of the various States, and that every amendment has been made either through a demand on the part of the people for a return of a part of that power or by a voluntary concession of greater powers by the States themselves for the establishment of a more perfect Government.

But for the first time in the history of legislation the Members of Congress themselves are initiating a constitutional amendment that no State, or the people of no State, ever thought of or ever asked at our hands. No class of people, no State, and no newspaper even ever demanded the relinquishment of governmental power in the supervision of the election of United States Senators, a power which in the field of its operation has been demonstrated to be essential to the integrity of the Government. I repeat, neither do the people of the United States or the States themselves demand that we should relinquish that power. We initiate the demand; we beg the States to take it back; we ask to be relieved from the burden of its exercise. Why, Mr. Speaker, this proposition absolutely amounts to treason by the Congress of the United States to their own prerogatives, to their own responsibilities, and to their own constituency. [Applause on the Republican side.] We voluntarily declare that we are unfit and unworthy to discharge the power that the States have conferred upon us. We abandon the discharge of an important function absolutely at our own initiative.

It has been the boast of every jurist and every statesman that the powers and functions of government have been so wisely distributed by this Constitution that by accepted principles of construction it has adapted itself to the amazing changes of a progressive century without changing its fundamental character. It has been heretofore an immutable instrument written on bronze. But if you are going to adopt this simple and easy principle of amendment by a voluntary abandonment by the Congress of powers never sought to be recalled, if you begin to emasculate it by supinely relieving yourself from the exercise of those powers, you will make it a facile instrument written in sand. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time is up.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I had expected to recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] for five minutes. He is willing to yield that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The proposition to elect United States Senators by the people is a legitimate subject of constitutional amendment that has been demanded by the people of the States. It has been demanded by resolutions of States; it has been demanded by State legislatures. Nay, more, many of the States have practically adopted it by legislation, and there is a universal demand for that species of constitutional amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I should like to, but I can not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. But the second proposition—the proposition to relieve ourselves from the supervision of the election of United States Senators—is not only uncalled for but it takes away from us a vital fundamental power necessary to the preservation of the Government itself. I call your attention to the fact that it absolutely destroys the equilibrium of the United States Government as conceived by its founders and as developed and demonstrated by actual experience for 125 years. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that the two branches of the legislative department, the House and the Senate, are one. They are not two coordinate powers, they are two parts of one coordinate power, differing somewhat in their minor functions, but in all constitutional powers, in all constitutional matters, one before the law of the land.

You propose to surrender to the States the right of Congress to exercise that prerogative of sovereignty in the election of United States Senators, and you propose to preserve it so far as the election of the Members of the House is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House a few years, and on many occasions—indeed, on all occasions where it was possible—I have heard the Members of this House inveigh against any attempt to create any distinction between the power, dignity, and sovereignty of this House as contrasted with the power, dignity, and sovereignty of the House at the other end of this Capitol. You now propose, gentlemen, for the first time in history, to do what the fathers never dreamed of doing, to draw a distinct line of demarkation. You say, in effect, that so far as the regulation of our own elections is concerned, we can control that, but that we are entirely too weak and insignificant to control the election before the people of so great, dignified, and august a body as the United States Senate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, we are all officers of the United States Government. Our qualifications are prescribed by the same Constitution. Under this amendment we shall be elected by the same electors. Our duties are the same, and we both stand at the legislative bar of the country and take the same oath of office, the same oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States. Yet, for some covert and undisclosed purpose, you propose for the first time to destroy absolutely your own dignity and equality before the law and to place the United States Senate in a position of greater power and authority. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The exercise of the power of Federal supervision over the election of both Members of the House and the Senate is vitally important to the preservation of the integrity of the Government.

The necessity for such supervision was one of the primary reasons for the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The preamble to that Constitution declares—

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The first declaration of the purpose for forming a constitution was in order "to form a more perfect union."

The Union existing under the Articles of Confederation was fatally defective, because there existed no power therein to compel the States to send Representatives to the Congress.

The States failed or refused to send Representatives, and thereby so emasculated that body as to render it incompetent to perform the responsible functions of government, and for that reason section 4 of Article I of the Constitution provided that the times, places, and manner of holding election for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislators thereof, that the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The power to compel the States to send their representatives, both in the House and in the Senate, to create a Federal legislative body is one, therefore, of primary importance.

This power has been exercised by the Federal Government, not, it is true, to compel them to send Representatives, because no State, except during the War of the Rebellion, has ever refused to perform that function.

Congress has at various times, however, exercised the power conferred upon it by this section as concerns both the election of the Members of the House and Senate.

The first exercise by Congress of the power conferred by this section was in 1842. To remedy the evil which arose from the different methods adopted in the various States for the election of Members of the House of Representatives an act was passed requiring that each Member of the House should be elected by a separate district composed of contiguous territory, some of the States having elected their representation by a general ballot—that is, by permitting each elector to vote for as many names as there were Representatives—which worked an injustice to other States which did not adopt that system.

To remedy the evil arising from the election of Members of Congress at various times in the different States, Congress, in 1872, placed upon the statute books a law requiring the election of all such Members to be held on the Tuesday following the first Monday in November in the year 1878 and on the same day of every second year thereafter.

Congress has likewise exercised this power with respect to the time and manner of electing Senators of the United States. Section 14 of the Revised Statutes was designed to provide uniformity in the time of electing United States Senators by requiring the legislature of each State chosen next preceding the expiration of the term of any Senator to choose his successor on the second Tuesday after its meeting and organization.

Section 15 of the Revised Statutes was intended to overcome the frequent failure of the legislatures of the States to elect Senators at the proper time by one branch of the legislature voting for one person and the other branch for another person by compelling the two bodies to meet in joint convention, fixing the day when this should be done and requiring them to meet every day thereafter until a Senator was elected.

That this power has not been more frequently used is due to the fact that the several States conscious of its existence have by consistent and uniform action complied with the spirit of the Constitution without the necessity of Federal action.

The resolution of amendment adopted by this House, and which is now being so earnestly advocated by the Democratic majority, provides for the relinquishment of this vital and necessary Federal control over the election of United States Senators and to return the same to the people of the United States to be exercised wholly as they may determine, free from the supervision of the Federal Government.

This, Mr. Speaker, is an insidious and dangerous attack upon the vitality of the Federal Constitution. The central idea of that instrument, as conceived and constructed by the philosophic statesmen who made it, was that of a complete Federal organism, having within itself perfect powers of organization and of perpetuation—its three coordinated departments under its own complete dominion and each exercising its own functions with entire immunity from State interference. It was to be a national autonomy, a complete sovereignty, and the essential prerogative of sovereignty is undisputed and undivided power over its own instrumentalities.

This amendment means the overthrow of this scheme. It removes from Federal control an undivisable half of the legislative organism of the Government. It is no longer to be a sovereign power capable of complete independence, controlling its own instrumentalities by the laws of its own creation; but hereafter its laws are to be made partly by the ambassadors of individual States over whose election it can exercise no control and whose local and peculiar interests may be adverse to the general interest of the whole country, which the United States Congress was created to protect.

Mr. Speaker, this work we are doing to-day—this off day—which we are filling in by amending the Constitution, may become historic. We are putting the ax to the root of our institutions. We are in the most casual and indifferent manner touching sacred things. Cut out one of the functional parts of a vital organism and the whole may speedily die. I see in this sectional attempt to strike down Federal power grave danger—irremediable mischief.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the American people will consent to it. I believe they will be wiser than we are. I believe they love our great Constitution more than we do, and I believe they will reject the amendment. They will see in this attempt what we now ignore. They will understand that those who advocate this measure, who openly declare that they will prevent the amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators being submitted to the States unless it is coupled with this revolutionary condition—I say the people will understand that those advocates have some dangerous ulterior object in view—that they design to obtain a power for their States which the Constitution of our fathers denied them.

The reasons for this are not difficult to discover. One section of this country is still arrayed against the other politically. In the great civil conflict of 50 years ago they were defeated. They are now in power in this House. This demand comes chiefly from that section. It is seeking the same power now that was denied it then—the power of the State to control the Nation for its own end untrammeled by Federal supervision. The attempt now is more insidious, but none the less dangerous. A constitutional amendment has not the terror of a conflict of arms, but it may be found more destructive.

This resolution of submission will pass the House in the unamended form in the face of the great Democratic majority against us; we can not prevent it. But I repeat, I have still unbounded confidence in the people of the country. I believe when submitted to them they will absolutely reject it; that they will not purchase the power to elect their Senators by a direct vote at the price of relinquishment of the Federal control over these elections; that they will hold responsible at the polls the party that thus seeks to entrap them. I believe they will say to this Congress: If you are unwilling or unable to exercise the powers conferred upon you by the Constitution to discharge the full measure of the duties you were elected and sworn to discharge and which has always been discharged by your predecessors, instead of going to the States and pleading to be relieved of your responsibilities by taking away from you these powers, resign your positions, and we will send other men who can and will uphold the Constitution, preserve the Government as it was given to us by our fathers, and maintain the supremacy of our great Nation not only against the other nations of the world, but against its enemies at home as well.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it ought not to be necessary, after the prolonged discussion that was had here and in the Senate of this proposed amendment, to restate certain propositions. And yet the debate that has taken place to-day makes the restatement necessary.

Bear in mind that it is not, in any true and practical sense, accurate to say that in proposing simply an amendment to the Constitution as to the manner of electing Senators of the United States you do not affect the power of the Federal Government over such elections. No man can here state—I will give such little time as I have to any man who can state—any practical way that the Federal Government now has of controlling the election of United States Senators.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman would not yield to me, but I will yield to him.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I can tell the gentleman how it has exercised that control very potentially and very necessarily.

Mr. SHERLEY. State how and where.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. In compelling the two houses to meet jointly for the election of a United States Senator, thereby preventing what might frequently occur, the two houses voting separately for different men and never reaching a conclusion.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has stated one case where Congress provided as to how the legislature shall ballot, and to that extent my statement may seem too broad, but the gentleman would have to admit that there is no power now in the Federal Government to control the election of Senators in the same sense that the power exists to control the election of Representatives. While the language is the same, the practical power is different. Under the power to regulate the manner of holding an election for Representatives, Congress, while unable to prescribe the qualifications of voters, can give to the Federal Government complete control, as it actually did during the reconstruction period; but while Congress can now determine the manner by which members of the legislature of a State shall elect a Senator, it can not control the manner by which those members of a State legislature shall be chosen. As the Constitution now reads, Congress has power over but one of the two steps in the election of Senators. Now, by providing for the direct election of Senators you eliminate this step, leaving only one, and to that transfer the power that now relates only to the second. The result is that this House and the country in considering this amendment is confronted with this proposition: Shall you, by changing the method of electing Senators in Congress, enlarge the power of the Federal Government, or shall you narrow the power? That is the practical question.

The Bristow amendment enlarges the power. The adoption of the House provision narrows the power. I am going to be perfectly frank; it does not leave it in the same condition; it does legally narrow it, although, in my judgment, it does not narrow it in any practical way. Neither is it so, as implied by speeches of gentlemen on that side of the House, that the Federal Government has by the Constitution the same power to control all of the agencies necessary to its own existence. If gentlemen will read the provision referring to the election of President and Vice President, they will find that the power there conferred was originally limited to the "time" and did not extend to the "manner." And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania would use the strong word "treason" because we say a different rule should apply to the power of the Federal Government over the election of Senators to that over the election of Representatives.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not pretend to say that the Constitution does not exercise a protective power over the election of President and Vice President?

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean to say that the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon Congress anything like as broad power over the selection of electors as it does over the election of Representatives.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Does it not prescribe the time and manner and place of holding the election?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will read what the Constitution says. The third paragraph of the first section of the second article is: "The Congress may determine the time of choosing electors."

It does not refer to the place and manner.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Read the twelfth amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I will. It reads:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania (interrupting). The amendment goes on to tell how the election shall be held and declares the time, the place, and the manner of holding that election.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true; but the gentleman can not show any warrant for an assertion that the Federal Government has control over the selection of presidential electors by the State in the sense that they have over the selection of a Representative.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Oh, no——

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says, "Oh, no," and that is the vital matter. It is the power to determine the manner in which such electors are chosen which is fundamental, and Congress has not the power in that regard that it now possesses over elections of Representatives.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The Constitution prescribes the time, manner, and place of controlling the electors for Members, the electors for Senators, the electors for Vice President, but the people happen to be the electors of Representatives. The legislatures of the various States are the electors of Senators, and the constitutional electors are the electors of the President and Vice President.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Constitution of the United States does not, in my judgment, give to the Federal Government the power as to the choosing of electors that it does over the choosing of Representatives. The power is not the same. The power as to the Federal Government over the election of Senators now is not the same as exists over the election of Representatives. Now, it is true that the Supreme Court held that the power over an election of Representatives was a power sufficient to enable the Federal Government to practically take charge of the election of Representatives.

In my humble judgment that power was never contemplated by the makers of the Constitution, but that is no longer a material question, because the Supreme Court declared the power was there. But there never has been and can not be under the Constitution as it now exists the power over Senators that now exists over Representatives. Some of us are not willing to give that power. We do not believe that the danger of the Federal Government failing through the States failing to elect Senators is nearly so great or potential as is the danger of an abuse of power in the election of Senators, if the Federal Government was given that power now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whatever fear there was in the beginning of this Government that the Government would not exist by reason of the failure of its component parts to provide for the election of Members of Congress has passed away. There is no man who seriously believes that we are in any danger of the Senate disappearing as a body by reason of the failure of the States to elect Senators. If we really believed that, you would have been willing to accept the suggestion I made on this floor, and the suggestion that was made in the other body, that the amendment be limited to those cases where the States refused to act. But gentlemen contend that this power must be given.

The Federal Constitution is a compromise between the believers in a National Government and the believers in a Federal Government. Running all through that instrument are these two ideas. Those who believed in a central government, where the States should be merged into it, had to concede their extreme position, just as the State rights men, who did not believe in the Federal Government having any power to exist except at the volition of the States, had to give up some of their contentions. Out of those concessions came the Constitution. The very provision that a Senator shall represent a State is an evidence of that compromise, and in representing a State he does not represent the people in the sense that a Representative does. The provision as to Representatives is distinctly national, that as to Senators distinctly Federal. Every Representative here is here because of the number of people in his district. Every Senator in that body is there irrespective of the number of the people within the State that he represents. [Applause.] He stands as an ambassador, and I repeat what I said before, as an ambassador of the State in its sovereign capacity.

How childish is it to say that the people of a State can not be trusted to send their representatives to the Senate of the United States, to a body that has power in some respects greater than either the Executive or the House of Representatives. It can do with the Executive what the House can not do. It can do, with the House acting with it, what the Executive and the House can not do.

I deny that the States will ever fail to elect Members to this great body, and I do not believe supervision by the Federal Government is either necessary or, in the broad sense gentleman urge it, desirable. I say to you that when history is written without passion, when the events of the days when our country was rent in twain have faded into enough distance to judge of that period impartially and without regard to section, it will not be found that the intervention of the Federal Government in the election of Representatives helped in the long, true course of history toward the preservation of purity of elections or of the real rights of the States and of the people. [Applause.] I do not believe that we can afford now to enlarge this power of the Federal Government. If it were possible to keep the power as it now is I would say yes; and why will not gentlemen on that side be fair? Why constantly undertake to give the impression that it is possible to leave the control of the Federal Government the same? Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] state that in his judgment as a lawyer he believes that the adoption of the Bristow amendment would not serve in a practical sense to enlarge the power of the Federal Government over the election of Senators?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman would permit——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I would say, if the gentleman would permit me and I had the time to discuss the proposition in his time, that I would engage to demonstrate with mathematical accuracy that it would do just that thing.

Mr. SHERLEY. All I can say in answer to the gentleman is that he occupies the unique distinction, so far, of being the only gentleman who has been willing to maintain that position. The debates in each body of Congress have not shown anyone else possessed of such a judgment as to power.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not believe that the prohibition of campaign contributions by corporations to the election of Representatives tends to purity of elections?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then do not you believe that the same prohibition applied to the election of Senators when they are elected by the people would further tend to purify the elections?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then why do you not join with us in concurring in this amendment, which would leave the power in Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. For this reason: Because the giving of the power that the gentleman wants would not simply rest in giving to the Federal Government the power to prevent corporate campaign contributions. The gentleman is wise enough to know that in this life you can not segregate things in that way——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is because I believe that it is more important to preserve, having some knowledge of the history of my country and of the conditions that confront all sections of it, the absolute control of the States in the election of their Senators than it is simply to give the Federal Government power to pass a law as to campaign contributions that I do not agree with the position occupied by the gentleman. This is my answer to the assumption of the gentleman that the power of Congress to protect elections at which Federal officers are chosen rests only on section 4 of Article I.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman think it is dangerous to increase the power of the people over the Federal officers of the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not. But I have not so much fear of the people of the respective States that I fear any danger to the National Government through the exercise of their rights to choose Senators of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have more faith in the people of Kansas than to believe that.

Mr. JACKSON. The people of Kansas did choose their own Senators contrary to many of the Southern States, and the man who offered this amendment in the United States Senate was elected by the people of his State, and yet the man who comes here and charges that he is not in favor of this amendment must know——

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I have not charged anything of the kind. The gentleman was either unable to hear me or to understand me.

Mr. JACKSON. I was not charging the gentleman——

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply stated——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky refuses to yield.

Mr. SHERLEY (continuing). I stated I had enough faith in the people of Kansas to believe their having exclusive power over the election of Senators from that State would not imperil the Nation. If the gentleman draws the other inference from it he is welcome to it.

Mr. JACKSON. I regret there is a difference between Kansas and other States in the Union——

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, I congratulate myself that my belief in the patriotism of the people of America is not confined to sections. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I trace my ancestry through those who stood on opposite sides when this country was divided in the great conflict. I, for one, thank God those days are far back, and I do not believe there is anything in the history of the Southland since those days that warrants the aspersions which the gentleman undertakes to cast upon those people and my people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. Did not the gentleman state in the main debate on this question that he wanted this amendment, or wanted it passed as the House passed it, because if it was not so passed it would be defeated in the Southern States?

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated this: The gentleman from Kansas asked me the question and he asked my opinion. I stated that, in my opinion, in the State of Kentucky it would make no difference, but I was inclined to believe, and I still am, that there was more probability of the amendment being adopted if it went to the States as passed by the House than if it contained what is now known as the Bristow amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, did not that in itself bring sectionalism into the debate?

Mr. SHERLEY. It brings the viewpoint of sections, and there is a vast difference between the viewpoint of sections and that narrow prejudice that impugns the motives of men because they differ with one another. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is a distinction that is world-wide.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, the colloquy can hardly add to the solution of this question.

Let me in conclusion say to the House simply this, that the question that you have presented is not one of whether you will leave, as it now exists, the power over the election of Senators, but the question is whether you shall enlarge that power by the Bristow amendment or whether you shall narrow that power. In my judgment, for all practical purposes the power does not exist now. We have presented what we believe is the real reform asked by the people. And let me state one curious fact, that it is those people who are least in sympathy with the reform itself that seem most solicitous over having the Bristow amendment incorporated in it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if gentlemen doubt the accuracy of that statement, a review of recorded votes will do much to enlighten them on the subject. So I conclude now, as I concluded before, that those of you who believe sincerely in giving to the people a more direct method over the election of their Senators can well afford to stand, as they stood a while ago, in the position taken by the House. They need not have any fear that the Federal Government's existence is going to be imperiled. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that the power, because it existed, would probably not need to be used. I go a step further and say that, if existing, I do not believe it will be used, and if not existing, no need for it will arise. Many men differ with me as to the probability of its use, and I beg of you who really desire to bring about this reform that you do not force those who hold a position more extreme perhaps than mine, but who are sincerely desirous of this reform, from the advocacy of it into an opposition of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I always listen with great pleasure to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. And yet what is this proposition? It is a proposition to change the method of electing Senators. I voted several times, right or wrong, but following my best judgment and voicing what seemed to me to be public sentiment, to submit to the States an amendment to the Constitution for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people of the respective States.

I voted against the passage of the House joint resolution at this session, not because it proposed to amend the Constitution to elect Senators by direct vote of the people, but for the reason that the joint resolution, in addition to providing for a direct vote, would have changed the Constitution in that provision which enables the Congress of the United States at any time, if the necessity should arise, to make or alter regulations made by the respective States for the election of Representatives and the choosing of Senators.

The Senate amendment to the House joint resolution provides for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people, but otherwise does not change the Constitution as it now is. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] was not as happy as he usually is when he sought to place the Senate higher than the House by calling the Senators "ambassadors" of their respective States. Nay, nay; they are plain Senators. [Laughter.]

Now, I will not vote for a proposed amendment to the Constitution which places a Senator in his election without the safeguards that surround the election of Representatives. Therefore I am going to vote for this Senate amendment, which will cure what many people believe has grown into an abuse—the control of legislatures in the selection of Senators by improper methods.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] asked a question as to whether it would be in the power of a State—in effect, by throwing the State into districts—to elect Senators by a minority vote in the event the House joint resolution was enacted into law without the Senate amendment. Undoubtedly that might be done. Undoubtedly the respective State legislatures would have this power. And yet gentlemen on that side—Democrats, glorying in "the rule of the people"—propose to place it in the power of a State legislature, by this joint resolution, to enact laws under which practically a minority can choose Senators; and the Congress of the United States would be powerless in the premises if the joint resolution is enacted without amendment and should be agreed to and ratified by the States.

A law has been—or will be—enacted for publicity of campaign expenses. Such a law, if the Constitution should be amended as this House joint resolution proposes, would compel publicity of campaign expenses of candidates for Representatives, but would not apply to senatorial "ambassadors." [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I would like to hear the gentleman discuss a feature of this subject which I think is of great importance, and which I did not get the opportunity to touch upon. The gentleman will observe that there is one very vital distinction between the original and the language that is left in. That feature does not seem to have been referred to at all in the discussion. The existing provision of the Constitution is:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Now, the portion that they leave in they change vitally. They say:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

I wish the gentleman would discuss that feature.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. The Congress can prescribe the manner of the election of Representatives under the Constitution as it is and under the Constitution as it would be in the event the Senate amendment is agreed to and ratified; but in the event the Senate amendment is not agreed to and ratified the Congress will be powerless to change the regulations in any State as to the election of Senators. For one, I shall not approve, by speech or vote, such a provision.

I want to say to gentlemen from the South, we had an unfortunate contest between the majority and the minority, leading to the great Civil War. Prejudice passed away from me long, long ago. You say there is no danger in the future. God knows. I trust there is no danger. Some people believe that if danger should come in the future it would not come from the Southland. Many so believe. Oh, I would to God that the successors of the men in the main who made that great contest from the Southland would recognize, as they practically do, the results of the great contest and would legislate in the present and in the future without harking back to the graveyard and conjuring up ghosts and then running from the ghosts.

I do not believe there would be the slightest objection on that side to the Senate amendment except as it might be made by you who failed in that great contest, for those who fail are always last to forgive and forget. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like just one more minute.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I shall not need that much time.

If you had forgotten, as we have forgotten—we who constituted the majority in that contest—this joint resolution as passed by the House, in my judgment, never would have been passed in its present shape, and the Senate amendment would not now be opposed.

Now, my friend from Kentucky, always candid, says that, true, under the Constitution Congress may in certain cases regulate the election of Senators. Yes; he acknowledges it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I said I would simply state this, that there is no practical way in which they can do it now.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. There is no practical way, the gentleman says, and there is no practical way now by which the people can elect Senators by direct vote. I will not split hairs with the gentleman. If there is no way that the same law and the same power should reside in the American Congress, touching the election of Senators as well as Representatives, I am here to help provide a way. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would not, to secure this joint resolution, make legislation that would apply to this body in the election of its Members and would not apply to the Senate in the election of its Members.

We are trying to correct that real or supposed abuse by a direct vote of the people; and yet you say "Nay; nay; we do not want that direct vote of the people to give the people the same power as to Senators that they have as to Representatives."

Great God! if a man is competent to vote for the election of a Representative, is he not competent to vote for the election of a Senator?

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I am much interested in what the gentleman said on the question of an ambassador from a State. Now, in the case of the late Galusha A. Grow, who was a Representative at large from the State of Pennsylvania, all the people of the State having voted for him, the Congress of the United States could have passed a law regulating his election, could it?

Mr. CANNON. Absolutely.

Mr. COOPER. He would have been just as much an ambassador, would he not, so far as the State of Pennsylvania was concerned?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; in substance.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggset that the exception to a rule is hardly the test of a rule.

Mr. CANNON. You know our power is pretty considerable under the Constitution as it is; not greater than it ought to be in the main. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, when I addressed the House before on this amendment I called attention to the fact that the power to elect Senators is now in the State legislatures, and if section 4 of Article I remains as it is, it does extend the power of Congress to the electorate.

This extension of the power of Congress over the voter of the State is too dangerous. That power now only extends to the election of Members of the House.

In the very fact that Congress can, if it deems proper, regulate and control the elections to the lower House of Congress and can not now control elections as to the other branch lies the real reason why Congress has not passed general election laws for the control of all Federal elections.

If now they passed a law prescribing the manner in which Congress should be elected and providing for Federal officers to hold these elections and determine who should vote in such elections, they could only control the election of Congressmen, because under Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, as it now is, the power of Congress only gets as far as the State legislature, but if we change the Constitution and put the power to elect Senators in the hands of the people, where it belongs, then the power of Congress to control elections of both branches of Congress will add tenfold to the desire to pass Federal election laws.

The people should control the Federal Government and not the Federal Government the people. The people of the States, so says the Constitution in Article X, are the source of all power. They can always be trusted. The Federal Government should reflect their sovereign will and not the people the will of Congress. Congress should ever be under the control of the people and not the people under the control of Congress.

No Federal election law should ever be passed. Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton, when the States were asked to ratify the present Constitution, assured the people of all the States that no such laws would ever be enacted by Congress. If the States had believed that the power would ever have been exercised there never would have been States to ratify the instrument.

No man who can trust his own constituents and the people of his own State can ever consent to extend the power of the Federal Government over elections. In God's name, as we love our liberty and freedom, let us guard at least one branch of our Congress from the possibility of Federal control.

I believe in placing all the officers of the Government as close as possible to the people who elect them. The power to determine who shall and who shall not vote is the sovereign power. If Congress can determine the manner of holding elections it can pass election laws, appoint the officers to hold the elections, prescribe the qualifications of voters, and say who shall or who shall not vote, and who shall or who shall not hold office, and finally become the supreme power in all elections, thus transferring the power of control from the people to the Federal Government. God forbid that such an evil day should ever come.

A complete guaranty that no Federal election laws will ever be passed is to adopt this amendment as it originally passed the House. A guaranty that Federal election laws will be passed will be to pass the Bristow amendment.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed surprising that some of our friends on the other side of the Chamber should, with such zeal, oppose the Rucker amendment. They are very careless with the facts of history.

A moment ago this colloquy occurred:

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I presume it is in the gentleman's mind, having stated that it was that portion of the proposed amendment to which he objects, to tell the House why he objects to it, and I would like to know.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed to do so, and I hope to make my objection clear.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. If the Bristow amendment, which is now before the House for action, shall be adopted, the Constitution will remain the same, except that Senators will be directly elected by the people.

Mr. OLMSTED. That will be the only change.

Mr. KENDALL. And if the Bristow amendment is rejected, as proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, and the House resolution should be enacted into law, the Congress of the United States would surrender all authority over the election of Senators?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, as another gentleman was speaking to me at the moment, I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. KENDALL. If the resolution as it passed the House should be finally enacted into law, it would amount to a surrender on the part of Congress of any authority over the election of Senators?

Mr. OLMSTED. It would indeed; and it is very questionable whether it would not so emasculate section 4 as to make it inoperative and ineffectual for any purpose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say that the proposition for the election of Senators by the people has passed the House at different times.

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has it ever passed the House with the amendment proposed in this House resolution—amending section 4?

Mr. OLMSTED. It never has to my knowledge—never. The demand for the change of that section sprung up only after the recent elections had changed the political complexion of this House.

Mr. KENDALL. Has that amendment ever been proposed in all the numerous times that the subject has been under discussion in the House until now?

Mr. OLMSTED. It never has.

This colloquy is a nice frame up on its face, but it is not in accordance with the facts.

My friend Mr. GOODWIN, of Arkansas, called my attention, and that of several other Members of the House, after this colloquy ended, to the fact that all of these gentlemen were entirely mistaken, and but for Mr. GOODWIN's attention and alertness it would not have been corrected in this discussion. The entire credit for the facts, as I now state them, is due to Mr. GOODWIN, who did not want the RECORD to go to the country without stating the facts.

Mr. KENDALL and Mr. LONGWORTH, in this colloquy, both were in error, and led the distinguished lawyer, Mr. OLMSTED, into the same error when they asked him if at any time an amendment had been proposed in all the numerous times that the subject had been under discussion in this House until now similar to the Rucker amendment, and Mr. OLMSTED replied positively that "it never has."

These gentlemen also leave the impression that this amendment is one never before discussed on the floor of this House. But such is not the fact. The zeal of these gentlemen led them into this error.

This very resolution has several times passed this House, word for word and letter for letter, as it passed a few weeks ago. This identical resolution was introduced in the Fifty-second Congress by the Hon. Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia, and after quite a discussion was passed without a single dissenting vote, so far as the RECORD shows.

This resolution failed to pass the Senate. The same resolution was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress by Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, and passed by a vote of 141 yeas and 50 nays.

The first time this resolution passed all the Republicans voted for it, or, to be more accurate, not a Republican voted against it. The second time it passed, in the Fifty-third Congress, such Republicans as the late Speaker Henderson and Mr. Hepburn, both of Iowa, voted for it, and the Hon. H. A. COOPER, of Wisconsin, and Dr. BARTHOLDT, of Missouri, also voted for it. These distinguished Republicans admitted that the resolution, identical with the one introduced and passed by this House, was a perfectly proper one.

Every intelligent vote cast against this measure and for the Bristow amendment is by a man who does not want the Senators elected by the people, and he wants it passed so that it will not be ratified by the States. Those followers and unintelligent Members who vote against it and for the Bristow amendment do not really appreciate how they are insulting their constituents at home and the people of their States and do not have perception enough to see the real change in the power now vested in Congress.

So, Mr. Speaker, we must conclude that every man who votes for the Bristow amendment is really against the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, because the great and patriotic Republicans of the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses voted for the identical resolution which is now before the House.

This resolution is the one which has been most discussed before the people, because at the time it was being discussed in Congress the Populist Party was pressing it and made it a great national issue at that time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL], in his question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], that to pass the Bristow amendment will leave the Constitution just as it is, except that Senators will be directly elected by the people, and the answer by Mr. OLMSTED, "That will be the only change," are also erroneous. These distinguished gentlemen are doubtless sincere in their position, but a careful examination into the question will convince them that they are in error.

If section 4 of Article I is left as it is and section 3 should be changed by amendment, placing the power to elect Senators in the people of the States instead of the legislatures of the States, it certainly extends the power, under section 4 of Article I, to the people who vote for Senators; whereas as it now is this power can only extend to the State legislature. So that a Federal election law passed by Congress now could not affect the manner in which a State will choose its own legislature. After that legislature is chosen then Congress can say in what manner that legislature must elect Senators. But this power in nowise affects the manner in which the people of the State have elected its own legislature or who had the right to vote or no right to vote in such State election. The people of the States are thus beyond the reach of Congress in senatorial elections, as the Constitution now is, but if the people vote directly for Senators, then the power which elects is the people of the State, and section 4 of Article I would apply to that power and thus enable Congress to control the State electorate in senatorial elections, which it can not now do. This is perfectly obvious, and the Democratic objection to the Bristow amendment is not foolish, sectional, or partisan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to summarize the case, let me say that I believe that no great reform in our legislation will ever be effected until we get Senators elected by a direct vote of the people of the States.

The greatest indictment against our present form of government is the corruption of our legislatures in senatorial elections. Within recent years every allegation in this indictment has been proven. We must not imagine that the verdict of the people is in doubt. It is made up. But we must not now trifle with the people. Let us not betray them by submitting an amendment which we know they will not and ought not to adopt.

We can trust the people of these States. They should have the right to send whom they choose to represent them in the Senate. They should not be supervised by their servants, whom they send here. A Senator is and ought to be a servant of the people of the State and of the whole State. He should not in any manner have the right to prescribe the manner of his own election. This should be left to his masters, the people of the State. The servant should never be permitted to get beyond the reach of the master. The people should always be permitted to control their servants and the manner of choosing them. The Senator is the ambassador of the people of the State, and they should determine in what manner they shall choose him. It should never be in the power of the ambassadors to prescribe the manner in which they shall be chosen. Leave that to the wisdom of the people of the States.

Great and powerful influence can be used more effectively upon Congress than upon the people of the States.

You Republicans have been so recently repudiated at the polls that you fear the people.

Good governments have never been destroyed by the people, but by those who fear them. Bad governments should be destroyed by them. No government should ever be organized so that when it is bad that with its army and navy it is stronger than the majority of the people. The people should never consent in their organic laws that their servants be vested with a power which, when abused, they can not destroy with their ballots. Therefore any control of the people's ballot by our Federal Government, which controls the Army and the Navy, should never be permitted. Let ballots and not bayonets control. Ballots should always be out of the reach of the bayonets.

Gentlemen of the House, as you love the institutions of your fathers, do not extend the Federal control of the election of Senators so far that that control shall reach the sovereign voter of the State. You can not reach him now in senatorial elections, and he will resent it if you undertake to do so.

The Bristow amendment, if adopted here and in the States, will reach him. You may adopt it here, but the States will not do so unless the people thereof shall say, We can not trust ourselves; we are unworthy; local self-government is impossible; we must have Congress to rule us and tell us who may and may not vote; we can not hold fair elections; we are too dishonest and too weak; we want the strong arm of the Federal Government made stronger, so that it will make us do right; the Declaration of Independence is a lie; local self-government is a failure; Article IX and Article X should never have been placed in our Constitution; government by the people is a failure; we want all power vested in Congressmen and Senators; they are wiser than we; we know not what we need; we are dishonest and can be bought; they are honest and can not be bought.

Gentlemen of the House, do you really think the people will ever say this? Do you not know that the people are aroused and will not thus be trifled with? You can not longer play upon their prejudices and passions. You can no longer make progress in the South, East, West, or North with the old "bloody shirt." Our people have a common destiny. The people of every section of our great Republic are ready to scourge from public life forever that man who would attempt to reopen the healed and healing wounds of the past.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from that section of the country which has just been referred to by gentlemen on the other side; born, as I was, after the great conflict was over; taught to love this Government, taught to honor and respect my flag, I regret that any word should have been said on the floor of this House during this debate on this question affecting, as it does, the people of Maine, no less than the people of California, the people of Washington, no less than the people of Florida; affecting, indeed, the sovereign citizen in one section as vitally as in another. I had hoped that at this hour in the glory of this great country of ours we of the South might be permitted to speak our honest sentiments without having hurled in our faces the fact that our fathers differed as to great questions.

Is it possible that in these discussions in the future they will rake up the old embers? I trust not; because this amendment which we are presenting to you to-day did not originate with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who has charge of it, but this was the work of the brain of the great Democratic statesman from Virginia, Mr. Tucker, and was introduced by a great and patriotic Republican Senator at the last session of Congress who hails from a State bordering upon Canada, a young gentleman who stands to-day as one of the leaders of this age, a man who rises above section, a man who looks at the question squarely and impartially; this same amendment was presented to the Republican Senate by this Republican Senator, and this amendment that the Democrats are supporting here is word for word and letter for letter as it was introduced by this Republican Senator. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore you can not accuse this side of the House of acting in any partisan spirit.

I want to say that I fear more the concentration of power here in the city of Washington than I do the exercise of power by the people in their respective States. I have an abiding faith and confidence in the people of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Pennsylvania, and other States. I believe they will be able to take care of the situation. The time has passed when there can be any fear of a lack of representation in either branch of this body. The time has passed when anyone believes there will be a failure to elect, which was the fear confronting the fathers of the Republic.

Now, one gentleman on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], referred to the fact that the power of the corporations and the great interests of this country would be exercised, or might be exercised in the election of Senators. I say to him that if that be true, I would infinitely rather trust the sovereign people of these States than to trust the laws that might be made in this body regulating the election of United States Senators.

Gentlemen, I know—and I would not refer to it but from the fact that others have—I trust that no State in this Union will ever again be called upon to drink to its dregs the bitter cup of Federal control of elections. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I sincerely trust that that fear is, as our distinguished Representative from Illinois had to say a moment ago, a mere ghost. May God forever deliver the people from that criminal ordeal through which we had to go when our old Mississippi capital was a saturnalia of crime, and when bonds were issued for public works that never were built and the people loaded down heavily with taxation because laws were made, not by the people of the State, but made here in Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I trust the hour will never come when the people of Maine, Washington, Illinois, or any other State in the Union will be governed from the city of Washington. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL].

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people has been a long-cherished hope of a majority of our well-informed citizenship.

The framers of the Constitution, having in mind both the expression of the popular will and the preservation of the sovereign States, provided in that instrument for Members of the House of Representatives to be elected by the direct vote of the people, while Senators were elected by the legislatures of the several States.

Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides:

SECTION 1. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. * * *

SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. * * * And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies. * * *

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators. * * *

This resolution as it originally passed the House, April 13, 1911, provided for an amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election, as the legislature may direct.

This amendment was in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3, Article I, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4, Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators.

The Senate amendment to this resolution which is now under discussion, and upon which we will soon vote, strikes out the provision that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," and places it in the power of the Congress to prescribe the time, manner, and places of holding elections for United States Senators.

To adopt this amendment would be to place in the power of the National Congress an absolute control of the elections held by the people of the various States in selecting United States Senators; a power that might be used despotically and in a manner subversive of liberty, preventing a fair expression of the people in the election of Senators.

Under the Constitution, the Congress has such power in regulating the elections of Senators and Representatives, but such control of the senatorial elections is adequately guarded, Senators being elected not by the people but by the State legislatures.

The popular idea that the Senate has, by reason of the manner of its election, been less responsive to the public will than was expected of it has occasioned a general demand all over the country that Senators should be elected directly by the people.

I most heartily favor this resolution; but I am unalterably opposed to the Senate amendment, which refuses to allow each State, by its legislature, to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding an election for Senator without the power of Federal supervision. The abuse of elections by congressional authority, and the ever impending threat of interference with State elections of Members of Congress, should be a sufficient warning to every patriotic citizen, and should inspire this Congress to vigorously defend the right of the people in each State to manage their local affairs.

If the resolution without this amendment should become the law, our purpose would be accomplished; United States Senators would be elected by direct vote of the people, under regulations prescribed by each State, and at the same time the integrity and efficiency of the Congress would neither be impeached nor impaired.

Our danger lies not in the liberty of the people, but in restricting that liberty. If the means of despotic interference with the sacred right of elections is made possible by the terms of our organic law, no one is wise enough to foretell where nor by what means the despotic power will be exercised. The interest of any one State is the interest of all; and a power inimical to one is a threat to each.

Mr. Speaker, it is as unfortunate as it is unjust that gentlemen favoring the Senate amendment, evidently desiring to force Federal control over elections, should endeavor to drag into this debate the animosities of sectional differences long since past. The war has been over for nearly half a century, and the issues that grew out of it have no bearing upon the question now before Congress save to awaken a rational caution against unduly investing the National Government with supervisory power over the political affairs of the States. It is, however, remarkable that those who adopt such questionable argument are the Members who seem to be opposed to this reform, and are really not in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. That school of politicians are always found against any proposition which seeks to put the people closer to the Government. They seem to distrust the people, and to consider that instead of the people controling the Government the Government should control the people, a theory that is contrary to the genius of the Republic. It is painful to observe Members who have grown gray in the service exert themselves with all their might to make this a sectional issue. The principle we contend for is not sectional; it is national. Democrats from all the States—North, South, East, and West—recognize the importance of trusting the power of elections to the intelligence and patriotism of the citizens of each State, realizing that the expressed and implied powers of the National Government are fully adequate to protect its integrity. It is in no danger from any State, but each State may be endangered by it if the rights of local self-government are foolishly surrendered.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a section in all this Union more loyal to the Constitution and the national flag than the Southern States. No section has more Americanism and none possesses greater patriotism. Our forefathers made the Constitution and unfurled the flag, and we are proud of both. The results of a fratricidal war, in which was spilled the best blood of the Republic, have been accepted by our people, and their pledge of loyalty is without qualification. We make no apology and ask none. Neither shame nor hate can be found in the bosom of the South.

The Southern States have never in all their history shown nor felt a disposition to interfere in any degree with the local self-government of any other section or any other State. Since the fires of war were extinguished and the smoke of its devastation has cleared away, the people of the South, instead of cherishing malice and ill will, have devoted themselves to the rebuilding of their homes, the fostering of their industries, and the uplifting of their citizenship, making a history that, were it truly written, would stand more resplendent than the achievements of any people in any country at any time. [Applause.]

In the last 40 years the South, arising from the ashes and desolation of war, has builded a prosperity that proclaims it to-day the most advanced and favored section of the Republic. Her people are in better condition than those of any other section of this Nation. They are not as wealthy as some, but their wealth is more justly distributed. They do not equal some sections in magnificence and display of wealth, but the opportunities are open to all. Freedom waves her pinions over every hamlet, the hum of industry mingles with hosannas, and hope stirs the blood and quickens the noble ambitions of brave, God-fearing people, who are true to their ancestry and love their traditions. We have suffered interference by the National Government with our local elections in time of peace. That day is past. We hope it will never come again. But not for ourselves alone do we uphold this fundamental principle—the right of local self-government. We protest just as firmly against the power of the National Government being exercised adversely to the rights of the people of any other section. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We stand for the people of the States. When they elect a United States Senator, they should do it in their own way. It is safe to have the people the repository of power; it is dangerous to take the power from them and unnecessarily intrust it to a delegated government. Such power in the Federal Government as the supervision of our elections might, under normal conditions, in times of absolute quiet, remain unexercised and do no harm. The danger would come in time of war, when, amid popular dissension, ambitious men, having the reins of government, would exercise such supervisory power in a manner dangerous to the liberties of the people and the life of the Republic. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I have voted on every occasion when this proposition was before the House in favor of electing United States Senators by the direct vote of the people. I have not given as much thought and attention to the Bristow amendment as perhaps I might have done, because I am perfectly frank to say that the Bristow amendment is not a burning issue in my section of the country. Amending the Constitution is a serious work, and one not lightly to be entered upon, and, in search of light to guide one's actions, it sometimes is useful to look up the RECORD and discover who are for and who are against the pending propositions. An examination of the RECORD when this matter was before the House will disclose the fact that many of the gentlemen who voted for the Bristow amendment, then offered in substantially the same form by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] when it was before the House, on the final roll call voted against the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Is not the gentleman mistaken there? Did not all of the Republicans vote for the amendment and only 15 against the resolution?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It may be that I have stated it wrong. I will state it over again, that all of the gentlemen who voted against the concurrent resolution, every single one of the gentlemen on your side of the House who finally voted against the concurrent resolution voted in favor of the Young amendment, which is substantially the Bristow amendment.

Mr. MANN. We all voted for it.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, did not all of the Republicans vote for the Young amendment?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. That does not alter my statement that every gentleman who voted in favor of the Young amendment voted against the proposition when he finally had it amended to suit himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the RECORD will show that of those voting "no" on the concurrent resolution all of them voted in favor of the Bristow amendment. It has been said by gentlemen on that side of the House that a failure to amend this concurrent resolution as it would be amended by the Bristow amendment might cause its defeat in certain sections of the country. Other gentlemen think that if the amendment prevails it will cause its defeat in certain sections of the country. I am inclined to the belief that perhaps there is more danger that this constitutional amendment will not become effective if the Bristow amendment is added to it. At any rate, as a Democrat who desires this sincerely, interested in the welfare of his party, I would rather the responsibility of defeating this amendment would rise on that side of the House than this. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in this and the other Chamber listening to the discussion of this question in silence. I confess that I have been somewhat annoyed by the evasion and dissembling that has been practiced in the discussion of this question. I am one of those persons who believe it is always best to be frank and discuss a question on its merits without evasion.

I confess I have been rather pleased this afternoon to find gentlemen on that side of the House at least becoming candid. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, what is the question involved here. It is the same question which has run through the history of this Republic and divided its people. The only difference between that side of the House and this is the difference between them on the question of State rights.

Every man familiar with the history of discussions which have taken place upon this floor during the progress of this country knows that the same question being discussed here to-day is the question that was discussed in these Halls just prior to the Civil War. It was the insistence of the South upon the doctrine of State rights that finally culminated in the Civil War.

There has been a group of States in the South that from the very foundation of this Government have entertained ideas upon the scope and power of the Federal Government at variance with the ideas of a large majority of the people of the United States, and this fact has made a constant conflict between these people, or, more accurately speaking, between these two ideas, and it seems to crop out in every effort of general legislation.

We are discussing here to-day the very questions that were discussed by Calhoun and Webster years ago. The same arguments are being offered on that side of the House that were offered by Calhoun. Now, gentlemen, I had hoped that that question had been settled and settled forever. I had hoped that that question would never again be the one upon which the fate of great legislation depended; but it is here, and there is no use in trying to disguise it. Let us strip off the mask, gentlemen, and look each other in the eye. You people are afraid that if the Federal Government retains the power to control elections in the South some of your plans will be interfered with.

You must have some plan in mind that you have not revealed because you do not believe, gentlemen, that the people of the United States as a whole are going to pass laws or make regulations that will interfere with a fair and honest election in South Carolina or any other Southern State.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Do you believe if the people of Iowa had the unlimited power to regulate the election of United States Senators that they would unwisely exercise that power?

Mr. PROUTY. No; and therefore we are not afraid that the General Government will interfere with us. Men only fear interference when they are contemplating some wrong. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Did not this proposed amendment as it passed the House a few days ago enlarge the powers of the people?

Mr. PROUTY. No; not as I see it, except as to the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Ah!

Mr. PROUTY. It is not changed because you say "Ah!" That fortunately does not change the Constitution of this interpretation.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I merely expressed regret that one gentleman can not see a thing so obvious to me.

Mr. PROUTY. I hope the gentleman's regrets will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, I guess I will be compelled on account of time to decline.

Mr. FINLEY. I did not catch the gentleman's remark about South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. FINLEY. I did not catch what the gentleman said about South Carolina.

Mr. PROUTY. I refuse to yield; and if you can possibly stop that gentleman, I will go on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. PROUTY. Again, what is the question involved?

It is a question as to whether or not the Federal Government shall have the power to preserve its own existence and purity by determining, if necessary, the manner in which United States Senators shall be elected.

You gentlemen from the South seem to be extremely nervous for some reason. Why is it? Do you contemplate doing something that is wrong? I want to say to you that I am northern born and northern bred, and I know that these people contemplate no wrong toward you or your people. So long as you attempt to elect a man to the United States Senate from the South fairly you will not be interfered with by the North. I want to say with equal candor, if you have in your mind the contemplation of the election of United States Senators by methods that are unfair and unpatriotic, the North wishes to reserve in its Constitution sufficient power to interfere and secure for your people fair elections, if you are either unable or unwilling to secure them for yourselves.

You gentlemen say we are raising a sectional question. Now, who raised it? This constitutional provision applies to the North and to the South. This provision applies as well to Iowa as to Florida. It can not be said to raise a sectional question unless the South is contemplating doing something or attempting something that she does not expect the North to attempt. Then it is sectional. If the gentlemen put an interpretation upon the Constitution that clearly reveals the intent upon the part of the South to fraudulenfly elect United States Senators if necessary, then I concede that we are raising a sectional question; but if sectionalism has crept into this discussion, it has been due to the attitude of the gentlemen from the South. They have always fought for the doctrine of State rights. They have always chafed under the power reserving in the Constitution the right of the Federal Government to supervise the election of Congress, both in the lower and in the upper House, and they think they are now in a situation where they can force an amendment of the Constitution in that respect.

They frankly say that the little coterie of Southern States will defeat the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution providing for the popular election of United States Senators unless another amendment is made to the Constitution limiting the powers of the Federal Government and extending the power of the States.

Almost everybody seems to be in favor of the popular election of United States Senators, and the gentlemen from the South are taking advantage of this situation to force into the Constitution that which they were not able to accomplish by the debates on this floor prior to the Civil War, nor by the decisions of the Supreme Court, nor by the terrible conflict of arms.

The gentleman from Kentucky was the first gentleman on that side of the House to admit or declare that the adoption of this constitutional amendment as proposed by his side of the House would limit the power of the Federal Government and extend the power of the State government beyond that now contained in the Constitution. It was his remark that caused me to rise and make this protest.

I am extremely anxious for the election of United States Senators by popular vote. For more than 10 years upon the stump in Iowa and elsewhere I have advocated such elections, believing it would do much to restore this Government to the people; and I say frankly that I know of no measure that would more quickly produce results along that line than by placing the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol in a position where they would have to respond to popular demand; but if it comes squarely to a decision on my part between the election of United States Senators as now by the legislature or surrendering to the South all the power of the Federal Government to interfere with their elections; if it comes squarely to a decision between the popular election of United States Senators and the extension of the doctrine of State sovereignty, I shall choose what I believe to be the least of the two evils and shall content myself by allowing the Constitution to remain as it is until such time as you gentlemen in the South are willing to have a Constitution that applies to you as well as to us. You have thrown down the gage of battle clearly. I for one accept it without faltering.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have always been in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, but I am in favor of the Federal Government retaining control over the manner of their election. Gentlemen from the Democratic side of the House have said that in all likelihood this constitutional amendment would not be ratified by the States if it is adopted in the form in which it is presented by the proposed amendment; that is, if the Federal control is not taken away. Why do the Democrats say this? Why do they insist on taking the power to legislate on this subject away from the Congress? Why do they want to strike from section 4 of the Constitution the words "but the Congress shall have the power to legislate"? The reason must be apparent to everybody who reasons. It takes no superior intelligence to understand their purpose. Their motive is that certain well-known States may have unlimited and unrestricted power to destroy the franchise of the negro. They want him while ostensiby free to remain the chattel of the designing politicians of the South.

They are willing to use the negro to do their menial service, but they wish to prevent his advancement in the scale of civilization. They are opposed to him as a man. They look upon him merely as an instrument to serve their purposes; they are not willing to accord him the rights of citizenship guaranteed by the Constitution and the right vouchsafed by God to all men. They disregard the Biblical injunction "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." They are not willing to concede that this is a government of manhood suffrage; they do not believe it is; in fact, they declare against it, not in words, but by acts, which are much stronger than words. They say this amendment to the Constitution can not be ratified unless it takes the power to legislate from the Congress. They know it, because there are enough Southern States to prevent its ratification. They want the States to have unrestricted control. They want to be able to pass laws through the State legislatures which can not be set aside by the Congress. They will not admit it, but if they are given the unlimited and unrestricted power to do so they will forever prevent a black man from exercising the right to vote.

I want the Congress to retain the power of control which it now has under the Constitution. You, my Democratic friends, want to take this power away. I want every man, black and white, guaranteed in his right of citizenship. The Democratic oligarchy of the South wants no interference with its arbitrary power. The Democrats are in control in this body—they have the votes to pass the amendment in any form they choose—the responsibility is yours, gentlemen; exercise it if you will give this additional evidence of your hatred of the negro. Stamp him under foot as you have always done, but remember that a just God still reigns and that the day will come when your present discrimination against the black man will be looked upon with disfavor by an unselfish, intelligent, and liberty-loving southern citizenship. Until that time comes it is my earnest hope that the Federal Government, through the Congress, may retain the power now given by the Constitution to prevent any unjust, unwise, revolutionary legislation by the States by which millions of human beings may be robbed of the right of participation in governmental affairs.

There is no reason why we should curtail the power of the United States Government as to the right to regulate the election of United States Senators. The Congress has the power to legislate on the question of how Members of the House shall be elected. Is a Senator any more sacred than a Member of the House?

Is there any more reason why the power of the Congress should not be extended to the regulation of election of Senators than there is that it should be retained as to the regulation of the election of Members of the House?

We are to have one set of rights under the proposition presented by the Democratic side of the House with respect to the election of United States Senators, and another set of rights with respect to the election of Members of the House. Do gentlemen from the Southern States wish it understood that the people of these States through their legislatures will fail to ratify a constitutional amendment which does not take away from the Congress the power to regulate?

The proposition, it was stated, was originated by a certain Member of the Senate. But the Democrats in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses presented this same proposition; they have presented it every time they have had power. They have endeavored to take away the right of the Congress to regulate the election of Federal officers.

The power of the Congress should not in any wise be curtailed. It is in no wise extended by this amendment proposed and known as the Bristow amendment. The rights of the people of the Union should be sacredly guarded by the Congress, and no State should be given the power to regulate the election of United States Senators without retaining in the Congress of the United States the power to control the action of the State in the event that that State undertakes to do what it ought not to do for the best interests of the people of the United States. We have 8,000,000 freemen in this country, liberated as a result of a civil war, and these men have rights, and those rights should be protected. Ah, it is true that Congress never has attempted to exercise special power with respect to the regulation of these elections, but it is because Congress has had the power that these States have failed to enact radical legislation discriminatory against certain classes of citizenship. To-day they are compelled to pass laws which, on their face, treat everybody alike, but which, as a fact, discriminate against a large number of our citizenship. They plead for the Filipino, but they do everything they can to crush to earth the American negro. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] how many more speeches he expects to have on his side?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Why, two or three. How many more has the gentleman on his side?

Mr. OLMSTED. Two.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman will recognize some gentleman on his side for a speech now, I will put mine in immediately following.

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I concede that every Member who really wishes that the people shall elect the Senators wants this question submitted to the people of the country untrammeled by any other question, untrammeled by any question of race prejudice, and untrammeled by any questions of special interests.

Now, that being true, I think enough has been said to show one question and one fact on the floor of this House that ought to lead to a solution of this proposition. And that will come, I believe, Mr. Speaker, from submitting this question to be voted upon by the people, changing the Constitution only so as to give the people the right to vote for Senators. Now, why do I say that enough has occurred here to show that that is right and the way it ought to be done? I say that the intensity of this demand coming from the people of the country and the anxiety of the people of the South to shoulder the responsibility of defeating this amendment, if it is submitted, upon the people of the North, and, on the other hand, the anxiety of the northern people to shoulder it upon the southern people, if it is defeated, show one fact. Now, what is it? It is that the election of a Senator of the United States is a national question and not a local one. The people of Kansas are not alone interested in the proposition of electing their own Senators. They are also interested in the proposition that when they do elect a Senator by a direct vote of the people that his vote shall not be annulled by the vote of another Senator who was not elected by the vote of the people, but was elected because of race prejudice or ignorance, or, if you please, by special interests in some other State of the Union.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JACKSON. Just a moment. Replying to what the gentleman from Kentucky, who now seeks to interrupt me, said when I interrupted him, I had no idea of reflecting upon the people of the South. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the demand for laws enacted by the Federal Government to regulate elections will more likely, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has already indicated, come from the Eastern States, where special interests have too often controlled State legislatures, or the Western States, where industrial prejudices have at times threatened the safety of life and property, or the extreme West, where a new race problem is fast becoming imminent, rather than from the South, or at least it is just as apt to do so. But I protest that gentlemen upon that side of the House should stand here and declaim in favor of the rights of the people day after day, and yet the very moment that somebody proposes to give the Federal Government power to do the will of the people through the power of the people they vehemently object.

Now, I would like to know how you are going to make this a Government of the people; I would like to know how you are going to establish in the Constitution of the country the right to elect Senators by the people, unless you give that same Government, which you profess to have confidence in, the power to regulate those elections.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. JACKSON. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the logic of the gentleman's position carry him to the point where the Federal Government should determine the qualifications of the voters themselves?

Mr. JACKSON. It does; and I claim that it has the power now as to the Representatives who sit in this body.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not mean to contend that the Congress can now determine the qualifications of voters in the States?

Mr. JACKSON. I contend that it can prevent fraud and discriminations, and it has done so.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not meet the question.

Mr. JACKSON. In certain respects it does determine the qualifications of the voters.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. JACKSON. I can not yield any more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. Referring again to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, which has been discussed heretofore, I desire to call attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of ex parte Yarborough, which has been cited back and forth in the debate on this resolution. I read:

"Counsel for petitioners, seizing upon the expression found in the opinion of the court in the case of Minor v. Happersett (21 Wall., 162) that 'the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone,' without reference to the connection in which it is used, insists that the voters in this case do not owe their rights to vote in any sense to that instrument.

"But the court was combatting the argument that this right was conferred on all citizens, and therefore upon women as well as men.

"In opposition to that idea it was said the Constitution adopts as the qualification for voters of Members of Congress that which prevails in the State where the voting is to be done; therefore, said the opinion, the right is not definitely conferred on any person or class of persons by the Constitution alone, because you have to look to the law of the State for the description of the class. But the court did not intend to say that when the class or the person is thus ascertained this right to vote for a Member of Congress was not fundamentally based upon the Constitution, which created the office of Member of Congress, and declared it should be elective, and pointed to the means of ascertaining who should be electors."

This answers the gentleman's question more fully than I can do.

Now, I say if the Federal Government means anything, it must have the power to protect its elections, to protect its electors, and in that way only can you secure the real rights of the people to control the election of Members of Congress and Senators.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the gentleman in that very opinion that the gentleman read, and it is fortified by a long list of cases where it is held that, so far as the qualifications of the electors are concerned, it is a State right and not a Federal right.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman can read those decisions for himself. I do not care to go into a further discussion of them.

This decision makes the matter as plain as can be. The Constitution fixed the qualification of the voter in its own way. In the language of the court, when the class, or person is thus ascertained, his right to vote is based upon the Constitution, which created the office of Member of Congress, declared it should be elective, and pointed to the means of ascertaining who should be the electors.

The whole law of this subject is clearly set forth in this decision, as well as excellent reasons why it should be maintained as it is and why it should be made to apply to elections of Senators. I read into the RECORD, the language of the court, at pages 660 and 661 of the decision (110 U. S. Rep.):

"So also has the Congress been slow to exercise the powers expressly conferred upon it in relation to elections by the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution."

This section declares that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time take or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

"It was not until 1842 that Congress took any action under the power here conferred, when, conceiving that the system of electing all the Members of the House of Representatives from a State by general ticket, as it was called; that is, every elector voting for as many names as the State was entitled to Representatives in that House, worked injustice to other States which did not adopt that system, and gave an undue preponderance of power to the political party which had a majority of votes in the State, however small, enacted that each Member should be elected by a separate district composed of contiguous territory. (5 Stat., 491.)

"And to remedy more than one evil arising from the election of Members of Congress occurring at different times in the different States Congress, by the act of February 2, 1872, 30 years later, required all the elections for such Members to be held on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November in 1876, and on the same day every second year thereafter.

"The frequent failures of the legislatures of the State to elect Senators at the proper time by one branch of the legislature voting for one person and the other branch for another person, and refusing in any manner to reconcile their differences, led Congress to pass an act which compelled the two bodies to meet in joint convention, and fixing the day when this should be done, and requiring them so to meet on every day thereafter and vote for a Senator until one was elected.

"In like manner Congress has fixed a day which is to be the same in all the States, when the electors for President and Vice President shall be appointed.

"Now the day fixed for electing Members of Congress has been established by Congress without regard to the time set for election of State officers in each State, and but for the fact that the State legislatures have, for their own accommodation, required State elections to be held at the same time, these elections would be held for Congressmen alone at the time fixed by the act of Congress.

"Will it be denied that it is in the power of that body to provide laws for the proper conduct of those elections? To provide, if necessary, the officers who shall conduct them and make return of the result? And especially to provide, in an election held under its own authority, for security of life and limb to the voter while in the exercise of this function? Can it be doubted that Congress can by law protect the act of voting, the place where it is done, and the man who votes from personal violence or intimidation, and the election itself from corruption and fraud?"

We have been treated in this House to a long dissertation from the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] describing the rotten boroughs of his own State and appealing to the national Democratic Party as the great deliverer of the people of Rhode Island from that condition.

Now, I do not mean here to approve of what he said of conditions in Rhode Island. I do not know about them. But what I would like to know is how in the world can the Congress of the United States, through the Democratic Party or any other party, guarantee to the people of Rhode Island the right to elect Senators unless the Government has the power to secure honesty of elections? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] so far forgets himself in this debate as to assert that the proposer of this amendment is not really in favor of the election of Senators by the people. The gentleman probably does not know that the mover of this amendment is one of the few Senators who was really elected by the people of the State which he represents.

And I assert that the Senators can as well be elected under the present laws of Kansas and Oregon, with the consent of the legislature, as under the laws to be prescribed by State legislatures under the proposed resolution, if it shall be adopted. If the State legislature so wills, Senators can now be elected by the people. It is the failure of the State legislatures to faithfully perform the duties conferred upon them by the Constitution which necessitates the proposed amendment of the Constitution.

The same gentleman refers to the failure of the Legislature of Colorado to do its duty. What is the remedy? According to the gentleman from Indiana, increase the power of the legislature. The gentleman from Indiana bemoans certain unfortunate circumstances which have been revealed in Illinois concerning the election of Senators. What is the remedy? Increase the power of the Legislature of Illinois; make it greater than Congress and more powerful than the Government of the United States. Then the gentleman delivers himself of this mighty truth:

"It is a well-known fact that legislatures do not always reflect the will of the majority of the people. Numerous examples of betrayal in this respect are familiar to us all."

And yet the gentleman pleads to have the power of the legislature increased. Down with "Federal control!" Let us have more power for the State legislature! In the South these legislatures can continue to keep nearly half of the people from voting, and in the North they can continue the conduct the gentleman so eloquently describes—that of betraying the public will.

The position of the gentleman as well as that of the party to which he belongs should be described as an attempt to increase the power of the State legislatures, and not as an endeavor to increase the power of the people over the election of Senators.

The whole truth is that these gentlemen themselves do not believe in the lopsided government which would result in giving into the hands of State legislatures unrestrained power over the election of one branch of Congress. But they fear, unless this trade of giving up Federal rights to the State as a bribe to persuade them to let the people vote for their Senators is carried through, the resolution can not secure the approval of the States in the South.

But what will become of it in the Northern States, where it must meet the approval of representatives of thousands of intelligent colored men who really vote? Thousands of these industrious well-to-do citizens are intelligent enough to vote even in the South, and would do so if they lived there. They are human beings, they have minds and hearts, and can think and feel. They are not likely to come forward and say to their former masters in the South, "We will now vote to help you continue your imposition on our brothers in the South, and we will do this in order that you may be given the right to vote directly for United States Senator."

The Constitution now says when a man is entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the legislature, he is entitled to vote for a Member of Congress, and the Federal Government is back of the guaranty. Why not leave it this way and adopt the same rule as to United States Senator? What is this "Federal control" which the Southern States fear so much? The control of a Government in which both Houses of Congress are to be elected directly by the people. There can be no great danger there. And it is manifest that the will of the people of the whole country as to election laws will be wiser and more wholesome than that of any one part of the Union, subject as it will always be to local causes and prejudices.

I want every jot and tittle of the States' sovereignty on local matters under the Constitution retained, but I also want the integrity of the National Government secured.

The hour has struck for the Democratic Party. It has come again to the parting of the ways. As so well said by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], "The hour of promise is over and the hour of performance is here." Choose this day between the right of all the people to elect their Senators and the exploded doctrine of State rights.

You say this right which you propose to take away from the National Government is inconsequential; then, why contend for it? Let no one deceive himself; this resolution must be passed now or it will not be passed this session, and every Democratic Member of this House knows it. When you refuse to consent to the Senate amendment you have killed the entire resolution and declared to the country that you are more interested in securing a little more State rights than in securing the election of Senators by direct vote.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a Member of this House who is more reluctant than I am to see the Constitution of the United States altered or amended, unless the welfare of the people of the country demands the change. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that any sectional feeling can properly be brought into the consideration of this subject. I do not see how it can justly find a lodgment in this discussion. The object of the joint resolution we are discussing now is to elect United States Senators by the people. The joint resolution passed the House and was amended in the Senate by the narrow margin of one vote, known as the Bristow amendment. It is that amendment that provokes opposition. In order to make myself intelligible I shall read Article I, section 3, of the Constitution:

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

The amendment seeks to elect Senators by the people and change the manner in filling vacancies. The other article of the Constitution involved in this important question is Article I, section 4:

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 4. The time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The joint resolution as it passed the House left the matter of the time, place, and manner of election of Senators to the respective legislatures of the different States. The Bristow amendment strikes out or leaves out the words of the joint resolution as it passed the House that directed that the legislature shall prescribe the manner and time for the election of United States Senators, and leaves such authority entirely dependent on section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, which I have just read. That, Mr. Speaker, is the situation, as I understand it. The question is asked: How is it that any of us object to the amendment?

It is generally conceded, and that in a much broader sense than I am willing to admit here now, that the Federal Government has the right to supervise and provide for the election of Members of the House of Representatives, under the provisions of section 4, Article I, of the Constitution. But I shall not undertake to elaborate my views on that line now. But it is not denied that under section 4, Article I, that the Government has exercised some authority and control over the election of Members of the House of Representatives. But the vital and far-reaching inquiry is, If by a constitutional amendment the election of United States Senators is taken from the legislature and the authority granted to the people, what effect will that have on section 4, remaining as it now is, in the Constitution? That section provides for "holding elections for Senators and Representatives."

It looks to me that is a clear proposition that the Federal Government would assume, under section 4, the same control over election of Senators that it has exercised, or can ever exercise, over the election of Members of the House. That is why the opposition to the Bristow amendment is emphatic and decided. There are strong corroborative circumstances to substantiate these views and warn us all against the dangers lurking in this amendment. The election of Senators or the manner, time, and place of election has never, under section 4, been invoked by the Federal Government. It would have been unreasonable and impracticable. United States Senators are chosen by the legislatures, and the people elect the members of the legislative bodies that elect Senators.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I do not think any sectional feeling can properly enter into this discussion. I find that many of the old Colonial States, in the ripeness of their wisdom and acquainted with the grasping power of monarchy, frankly expressed their views at the time our Constitution was framed as to what control or supervision the Federal Government should have or exercise over State elections; and they were pronounced in their convictions that the Federal Government should not interfere in elections provided for, unless the State had neglected or failed or refused to hold such elections as were necessary to carry on the Government. They simply said if the State should, for any cause, neglect to perform its highest duties to the Federal Government then the Government to protect its own existence could step in and take charge of the elections. No sane, patriotic man can object to that policy, and that is what our side of the Chamber wants.

Mr. Speaker, I say again, the fear that we have about this is not a sectional matter. That gives us no trouble. In fact, our section feels practically safe. Some man might, by some overzeal, bring in a racial question, which would be unjust and unfair, because race feeling has developed itself in all parts of the North. It is no longer confined to any one section. We are conscious of the fact that some few people of the North object to our State constitutions as to its limitations on the manhood franchise. The State I have the honor in part to represent—Alabama—makes no discrimination in its requirements of suffrage qualifications. As I am advised, the Supreme Court of the United States passed on a similar suffrage qualification and held it not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. We are getting along very well on that line. The South is becoming rapidly one of the most prosperous sections of the Union. Better drop that.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] a few minutes ago—and I have great respect for the gentleman—put this question, as I understood at this distance: "Why is it that Senators should not be subjected to the same election rules and regulations as Members of the House?" Why, Mr. Speaker, if a man studies the theory of our dual form of government, I am surprised that he should ask that question. We know that, not the South alone, but Massachusetts and other colonial States, with Hamilton and Madison to help, who contributed so much to the strength, virtue, and wisdom of our Constitution, stood strongly for the view that a Senator represented an entity, represented the sovereignty of a State—representing all the people. The Senate as a body can and does engage in a great many things that the House can not engage in. We represent districts and subdivisions of the people.

The Senate represents the sovereignty of the State, with equal power given every State in the Union. It may be that the next proposition will be to give the large States not more than a certain number of Senators and the small States shall have not more than a prescribed number. We are, as a Government, stepping in that direction. I said just now that possibly a racial question might be brought into this contest. But I am reluctant to believe that any Member on the other side of the Chamber would willingly do that injustice and wrong to our peaceful condition. There is no occasion for sectional pyrotechnics, and I hardly think anyone will so indulge. It is a plain, open question as to whether the Senators should be subject in their election to the same restrictions as are Members of the House. I say that to do that is to menace dangerously the perpetuity of our Republic.

No extreme measure of legislation for control of elections has ever been applied to Senators. Look at the Force bill that was attempted here years ago. I refer to it merely as an example. Did it apply to Senators? Why, no. It applied only to Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the war is over. [Applause]. I did not intend to speak upon this question, but the sarcastic remarks and bitter insinuations of ex-Speaker CANNON about the South and the war between the States are responsible for my part in this debate. Dr. Ellis—and he is a northern man—in his History of Our Country, says that the question of secession was never authoritatively settled until the war settled it. Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts, said that prior to the war between the States the opinion was universal that in case of conflict between State and Federal governments sovereignty resided with the State and to it allegiance was due.

Mr. Speaker, good men and true fought on opposing sides in that conflict, fought for the right, as God gave them the power to see it. The South accepted in good faith the settlement of the sword, and we have supported loyally the flag of our common country. But the South since that struggle has suffered humiliation and persecution, and the ex-Speaker of this House, who was so ungenerous in his remarks a little while ago, has contributed to that humiliation and persecution.

He voted for the force bill, and he voted to reduce the South's representation in Congress, and he has voted against the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. He has been repudiated by the country, humiliated by his own party, that refused to make him minority leader, and now he invites upon his head the contempt of the South—the section that gave him birth. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] He may talk about the war and say that we are slow to forget and forgive.

Mr. Speaker, when my country was embroiled in war with Spain I saw "Fighting Joe" Wheeler stand side by side with Gens. Shafter and Fitzhugh Lee and the son of Gen. Grant, fighting beneath our country's flag, and when I saw Worth Bagley, a southern boy, spill the first blood in that struggle at Cuba and the Stars and Stripes wrapped about his lifeless form and buried with him in North Carolina, I said: "Thank God! The war of the sixties is over; we are a reunited people, with one heart, one country, and one flag." [Loud applause.] Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentlemen who represent the trusts, who do not want United States Senators elected by the people, that they can no longer deceive the North, the East, the West, nor the South by appealing to prejudice and trying to stir up strife between these sections. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen, you can no longer hide your opposition to meritorious measures by appealing to the prejudices of the people. Your real position on this question shall be known. Stand up like men and show your hands, and never again try to hide behind a struggle long since dead and gone. Let the dead of that war—the blue and the gray—sleep, each in the mellow moonlight of his own proud memories—sleep until the light of eternity's morning shall break beyond the mystic mountains. Let East and West and North and South all work together for the good of each, and each for the good of all. Let us in the living present strike hands about a common center, for the good of the Republic, and bury this sectional feeling forever. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri how many speeches will be made on his side?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Only one more.

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I want to yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I just came into the House at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I am told that he took occasion to criticize my remarks as well as myself. I look in his eye and say that in my judgment the threat that you claim came to the South on account of the ignorant votes, especially the far South, has been for years removed; and in my judgment, it is just such gentlemen as the gentleman from Alabama, instead of accepting the situation, gets up the scarecrow of negro domination to play upon the minds of the people of the South that he may be perpetuated in political power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Illinois, the former Speaker of this House, did not need to say a word defending himself from the aspersions of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], because the mere birth of the gentleman from Illinois in North Carolina has cast more luster on the South than all the labors of the gentleman from Alabama ever has or ever will. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States now provides that Congress may at any time by law make or alter regulations in regard to the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives which may be prescribed by the several State legislatures, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], usually very accurate in his statements, challenged any exercise of the power by Congress under this provision of the Constitution as to the election of Senators, forgetting, apparently, that every Senator now in the Senate was elected, not in pursuance of State law, but in pursuance of the law of the Congress of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have not exercised the powers that we have to regulate the manner of electing Members of the House, but we have exercised the power of regulating the time and manner of electing Senators. You do not have to read far in the Revised Statutes, until you find the third page, and it is in accordance with the provisions of the third page of the Revised Statutes of the United States that every senatorial election has been held in every State for years in the past. And yet the gentleman from Kentucky thinks that this power has not been exercised.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MANN. I have not the time to enter into a controversy with the gentleman on that subject.

Now, what is this proposition? It is to take out of the Constitution this power which has been and is now exercised by the Congress. We have passed the law governing the election of Senators. It is to take out of the Constitution the power under which we passed that law. We would still retain, it is true, the power to regulate the time and manner of electing Members of the House. Is it proposed, then, to have a separate election for Members of the House and Members of the Senate that gentlemen on that side of the aisle are so strenuous? We will retain the power to regulate the election of Members of the House, but we shall have no power over the election of the Members of the Senate.

What is the reason for this? Mr. Speaker, it is not far to seek. Gentlemen on that side of the House have referred to sectionalism, have decried the raising of sectionalism. Who has raised the issue of sectionalism on this point? Here was a case where the people were asking that we give to them the power of direct election of Senators. No word said about changing the other provision in the Constitution; and lo and behold, that side of the House sprang sectionalism into this issue, proposing to amend another provision of the Constitution. They threaten that if that does not go into the Constitution they and their States in the South will refuse to ratify the amendment to the Constitution. They have raised the issue of sectionalism on this.

The proposition involved is fundamental to the perpetuation of our Government. If the provision now being sought for had been in the Constitution when the War of the Rebellion broke out, the South could have paralyzed the Government without rebellion, without actual secession.

What you want on that side of the House is now, after the war has settled the fact that the States can not secede, you want to accomplish indirectly what you were not permitted to accomplish directly. Since we by force of war declared that all the States in the Union shall remain in the Union, you want to give the power to the States to take away her representation in the Senate and refuse to participate in the Senate of the United States, indirect secession.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman, speaking for his side, agree on an amendment that will limit the power of the Federal Government to those cases where the States fail to send Senators?

Mr. MANN. I will consider that question when we get to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is presented now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kentucky is great, but he has not the power at this stage of the proceedings to present that question to the House.

Now, I do not want to waste any more time on that. The gentleman knows as well as I he can not do it. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman's party had the power to make that motion, a preferential motion. The gentleman from Kentucky himself had the power this morning to offer that as a preferential motion, which would have come first before either of the motions now pending in the House, but the gentleman did not seize the opportunity.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, the gentleman knows that the motion to concur is ahead of the motion to concur with an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I know quite the contrary, that the motion to amend takes precedence of the motion to concur. The gentleman himself ought to know that much.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, declamation does not make law.

Mr. MANN. Now, what is the proposition? That side of the House says that it will not ratify the amendment to the Constitution, and why? You are no more interested in the South in the election of Senators than we are in the North. Any law which Congress might pass that affected the South would affect the North. What is your peculiar interest in the matter? Why do you object to a possibility of Congress controlling the election of Senators in the South any more than we should object in the North? Why are you so tender on the point? Why are you so touchy about elections in the South if they are on the square? If the Constitution as we propose——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. For a question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Why does the gentleman always vote against electing Senators by the people, if you want to elect them and not buy them?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. I have not done anything of the kind. I voted against this proposition. Now, why is it that gentlemen on that side of the House from the South claim that they are so afraid of Congress intervening and requiring honest and fair elections? I shall speak the plain truth, because the truth ought to be spoken. The gentlemen on that side of the House are afraid that the grandfather clauses in the constitutions and elsewhere will be declared unconstitutional.

They are afraid that Congress may interfere to prevent the disfranchisement of the Negro vote in the South. They are in favor of the repeal of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which says that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

You southern Democrats believe that if you can insert in the Constitution, as you are now proposing, the following provision, "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," that this may be construed as a partial repeal of the fifteenth amendment, and whether it so operates as a matter of theoretical law, you know that you intend that it shall operate so in fact. The southern Democrats are not satisfied with the noninterference by the General Government which so far has prevailed in regard to the election laws of the Southern States. You want us in the North, by the adoption of this provision in the constitutional amendment, to condone and approve your actions in the Southern States in depriving people of the right to vote solely because of their color. Having kept the blacks in the South in slavery for many years, you now again wish to reduce them to a condition of practical serfdom and servitude.

You want the National Government to give to you a power under which you can deprive them of the right to vote, which means, in the long run, to deprive them of the right of education, which means, in the long run, the creation of a caste of laborers and practical serfs.

We of the North have had patience with you, probably more than we ought to have, in your struggle growing out of the freeing of the slaves. It was not possible for the ex-slaves and their descendants to fully embrace or appreciate in a short time the blessings or responsibilities of our American civilization and our form of popular government. But we certainly protest against depriving the General Government of power to require and compel honest and fair elections in the South and elsewhere when it shall become necessary to the preservation of our Union or our progressive civilization.

You ought to be more than satisfied that we of the North have not been unduly oppressive in regard to your elections and election laws. But now, nearly 50 years away from the War of the Rebellion, you are seeking to minimize the results of that war. You are trying to take away from the General Government a power which it has always had and you are endeavoring to force the North to agree to this by attaching it as a rider to an amendment providing for the election of Senators by direct vote.

The method of electing Senators is after all a mere incident in government. But the power of the General Government to preserve and perpetuate itself by regulating, if necessary, the election of Members of Congress, both Members of the House and of the Senate, is fundamental and necessary to the perpetuation of the Union.

With your minds inflamed and your heads swelled by a temporary partisan victory in the country you gentlemen of the South are now attempting the rôle which the southern people before the war performed, that of forcing the northern Democrats to yield to your leadership and to blindly follow you in matters which you propose in the selfish interests of Southern States and which tend to the destruction of national sovereignty.

You believe in giving to the States power which the General Government now has and ought to exercise. On this side we believe in preserving to the National Government national sovereignty. You wish to aggrandize the sovereignty of the States at the expense of the sovereignty of the Government. We wish to preserve intact the distribution and balance of power between the National Government and the States as laid down in the Constitution.

You believe in the impossibility of the progressive civilization of the Negro. We believe that the Negro is part and parcel of our community, and that we ought to do everything within our power to educate the Negro into the responsibilities of citizenship. We recognize him as a man with equal political rights. You object to his being anything but an inferior. We propose to protect his rights. You believe he has no rights. You declaim your devotion to the national flag, but you seek to strike the national power a blow, which in the course of time may become deadly and tend to the destruction of the Union.

We are willing to vote for the amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by vote of the people, but we are not willing, in order to obtain your vote for that proposition, to pay you the price of adding to it the other proposition to destroy the power which the Government now has to regulate, in case of necessity, the election of Members of both Houses of Congress.

We are not willing to abandon national sovereignty and national preservation and forsake the race which we set free. The slave power of the South in its palmiest days was no more imperious and impudent in its demands than you are in this demand to-day. But there will come an awakening. I repeat there will come an awakening. You will not always be permitted to stamp derisively upon the colored race which is making an heroic struggle for proper place and position.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is surely the irony of fate that brought the eloquent discussion of the learned gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to a close just while he was in the midst of the grandfather clause, found in the constitution of some States, because that is about as near a live, pertinent question pertaining to the great moral reform demanded by the people of this country in the election of United States Senators as any Republican leader ever gets. It is entirely appropriate that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who boldly asserts his opposition to any and every measure looking to the election of Senators by direct vote, should be chosen to close this debate for those who pretend to favor popular election, but who insist on a form of resolution which they think would be rejected and which they know would withdraw from the States some of the power they now have. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it was not necessary for the distinguished ex-Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to make his last speech, delivered a moment ago. His first speech put him correctly on record. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] made no reference to the negro question. He does not have to appeal to sectional or race issues to perpetuate his service here. His vote and his eloquent voice ever raised in behalf of the people of his country are a guaranty that Alabama will keep him here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I had sincerely hoped that nothing of a partisan character would be injected into this debate. I appealed to my very nonpartisan friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to keep the lid on and not inject partisan politics into this discussion, but he took the lid off; and following him came the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], then the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and others, all digging into the graves of the past, seeking to arouse passions which have long since been subdued, and which I had hoped were "in the deep bosom of the ocean buried" forever and forever.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman think that my remarks to which I am informed the gentleman from Alabama replied abounded in partisanship?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, I am not going to enter into a discussion with the gentleman. He has just expressed the fear that with popular election of Senators it might be possible to elect a Senator by a minority vote. This may be true, but I confess I would prefer to have a Senator elected by even a minority of honest, loyal voters rather than to have that high office bought in and controlled by special interests. Would he? He is the most distinguished exponent of the remnant of the once great Republican Party. He is the only man here who has the courage of his conviction—always wrong, but never afraid to champion the cause of error. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend that the question now before the House shall be confused. The issue presented is a plain one. Permit me to say to my Democratic friends, let no man fear that in following the lead of Democracy he will ignore the oft-expressed will of the people of the United States. We stand for that great reform which our party has so long and so often demanded, that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who is sometimes right, but generally wrong, says we insert in our party platforms with a rubber stamp. The Democratic Party intends to keep this great question before the people and before Congress until popular sentiment aroused by the sober judgment and unconquerable will of a determined people shall have lashed those who oppose us into submission.

Let me remind the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the only time the party to which he gives allegiance ever voted in convention upon this issue they voted down this reform demanded by millions of people, and which he says he favors, by a vote of about 700 to a little over 100. There was not righteousness enough in that Republican convention to save his party from the fate which befell Sodom and Gomorrah, if the good Lord in his mercy and compassion had not changed his mode of punishment.

Mr. Speaker, I earnestly hope that every man who sincerely, honestly, and conscientiously desires to respond to the voice of the people, a voice which has been echoing and reverberating through the corridors of this Capitol for 50 years, but which only penetrated the Senate Chamber in the last few months, will vote to nonconcur in the Senate amendment now under consideration. The command of the American people is plain and unmistakable. We are charged and commissioned to take the election of United States Senators out of the market. I do not want the price of a Senator from my State fixed by boards of exchange, in counting rooms, or in the offices of corporations or trusts. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] suggests that so-called jack pots have recently been resorted to for the purpose of corrupting legislatures and controlling the election of Senators. We want no jack-pot business in the election of Senators hereafter.

My learned and distinguished friend, Mr. MANN, like his distinguished colleague, Mr. CANNON, fearlessly and defiantly tramples upon the will of his constituents, as I believe I know that will, and opposes this reform; but I admire him. I admire him not for the good he does, but for his abandon in boldly saying to the people of that State which he so well represents in many respects, a people to-day discussed and sympathized with by everybody, a State which to-day in sack cloth and ashes is lamenting a condition which has placed a stigma upon its fair name, which time only can efface. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am sorry, under the circumstances——

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Not now; I will get to Kansas in a minute—I am sorry he [Mr. MANN] will not vote the sentiments of the great majority of the people of his State, Democrats and Republicans alike; that he will not by his vote reflect the judgment and wishes of the people and help to send this amendment to the several States in a form in which he knows it will be ratified. Let me warn you that if the Bristow amendment is agreed to by this House we will have evaded and not discharged our sworn duty. We are not simply directed to submit a proposed amendment to the Constitution, but we are charged with the duty of submitting a proposed amendment which we believe will be ratified by the States, thus securing the reform so long and so earnestly demanded. Concurrence in the Bristow amendment means the submission of an amendment for ratification which entire delegations on this floor tell us is objectionable to their people. Let me say, personally I do not share the apprehension that is expressed by gentlemen from one section that the Bristow amendment is fraught with dangerous and deadly menace to the welfare, happiness, and prosperity of that section, and I spurn the arguments made by gentlemen from another section that without the Bristow amendment the perpetuity of this great Republic is threatened. I can not believe the Federal Government will ever invade any sovereign State in this Republic to destroy it, and I will not believe that of all the 46 States, or of those which may hereafter come into the Federal Union, a solitary State can be named where any one man can ever be found who will be so unpatriotic as to seek to snatch from that flag a single star of that constellation representing the Union of States and the glory and the power of this great Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say, gentlemen, that treachery, insubordination, rebellion, and treason are not nurtured into the children of this country by the mothers who give them birth and under whose tender care they grow to manhood and womanhood. God bless the good mothers and wives of our land. [Applause.] It is to them that we look for the patriotism which in all the years to come will guarantee and preserve the Union of States, and a continuation of our onward and upward march which will forever make this the beacon light of all the civilized and patriotic nations of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I proudly proclaim we do fear the people of our country. God knows the safety and perpetuity of this free Government lies in and with the plain people. The danger which we may with good reason fear is the machinations, combinations, and conspiracies formed behind closed doors, in great counting rooms, in boards of exchange, in the private rooms of special interests, which seek to make a merchantable and commercial article of the most important and sacred right of the American people, the right to say who shall serve them.

I hope that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] do not mean to say that it would be dangerous to intrust the people of their States with a little more power. We propose to take just a little power from the Federal Government, not to lose it—God knows, not to lose it—but deposit it where it can and will be used—to give a little more power to the patriotic citizens of sovereign States, to those who respond to the country's call in the hour of peril, to the men who make the Nation great, and permit the loyal citizens of each State to determine the time, place, and the manner of electing their United States Senators. Do this and we will take the Lumber Trust, the Sugar Trust, the Leather Trust, the Steel Trust, and every other trust out of the Senate of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Does the gentleman from Michigan, and these other gentlemen, want to say to the intelligent, patriotic people of their States, "You are not worthy of this confidence"? Are the people of your States not patriotic enough and intelligent enough to be trusted with this small increase of power? Way down in the southland, the abiding place of virtue and beauty, of chivalry and patriotism, the hearts of those gallant people, those loyal sons of America, beating in unison, say to you: "We believe in the patriotism and intelligence of the people of the North, and we want to enlarge your powers and ours, we want to join with you and want you to join with us in amending the Federal Constitution so as to permit each sovereign State, unhampered and uncontrolled, to purify her elections, and secure the election of the people's choice to serve them in the Senate of the United States."

Our position is one of confidence in the great body of the people. You Republicans repudiate and denounce the citizenship of your States as wanting in intelligence, patriotism, and civic pride. They will soon repudiate you because you have proven yourselves unworthy of the trust reposed in you.

A distinguished gentleman, one of the great lawyers of this body, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], spoke of treason to the States. I was surprised at that. One trouble with him, and those who think as he does, is that they are governed too much by their personal views and inclinations and too little by the desires and wishes of a great constituency which reposed confidence in them. They subordinate the will and welfare of the people to their individual wishes and desires—sometimes the result of unpatriotic motives. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] used the pronoun "we" where he ought to use the pronoun "them" or "they." I am proud to be intrusted to do the will of the people I represent. I have no patience with a political boss.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Not now. I have passed Pennsylvania and I want to get to Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I do not believe the Federal Government will ever invade the States; but suppose I do not. I am not one of those self-constituted bosses who trample upon the will of the people and who deny and spurn the voice that comes to them from every nook and corner in their district, and who undertakes to read a lecture to the people on what is best for them. I do not believe that any of you gentlemen will deceive any considerable part of the people by your eulogies and panegyrics, your magnificent, beautiful expressions with reference to the fathers. The fathers specifically empowered and commanded us in that sacred instrument itself, the Constitution, to amend it just as soon as the trusts in this country commenced buying United States Senators. [Laughter and applause.] We have a duty to perform which now invites us. We can not put it off. If we delay one hour we violate the injunction imposed upon us by the fathers. I tell you to-day, my good friends, and especially you Republicans, who hail from that State whose people were first to catch the glad tidings of liberty, flung to the morning breeze by old Liberty Bell, that those immortal patriots who framed that matchless charter of liberty, the Constitution of the United States, with prophetic wisdom looked down the corridors of time and saw that the time would come and the necessity would arise to amend the Constitution they gave us. And let me say to you further in the words of the great Irish patriot, "If the spirits of the departed participate in the cares and concerns of this life," I doubt not that the spirits of the fathers are to-day hovering about this Chamber, solicitous for the preservation of the liberty they secured for us, and by their silent presence seeking to arouse you Republicans to patriotic action in your response to the known will of the people who confided in you.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has now gotten back to Pennsylvania. Will he permit an inquiry now?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman will make it very short.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman whether the very object of forming the Constitution of the United States, as contained in the preamble, namely, that "in order to form a more perfect union"——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am not going to discuss that. You gentlemen on that side would lead me into a discussion of the Ten Commandments, which you know nothing about and care less about. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman permit me an inquiry?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Let me tell you something. Four or five Senators——

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I have not finished the question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I know I am not permitted to mention a Senator's name on this floor. I can criticize my colleagues here on this side of the House or on that side, if I want to do so, but parliamentary usage forbids that I refer to a Member of another august body.

In the language of the poet—

A subject's faults a subject may proclaim,
A monarch's errors are forbidden game.

But let me say to you, and if, perchance, my words should be wafted on the breeze to a distant part of this Capitol, let me state with all the emphasis I can command: Backed by the will of the people of this Republic, people who have been oppressed in the exercise of their rights, people who have been degraded and States that have been tainted; supported by the will of millions of loyal people, I say to the representatives of special interests everywhere, I say to you Republicans who refuse to do your duty, you may do your worst; the will of the people will be accomplished. And I say, "So mote it be." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has not permitted me to finish my question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman will pardon me. My time is limited. We are going to pass this resolution submitting to the States for ratification an amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of Senators by the people. We are going to see to it hereafter that the taint of scandal shall not attach to the election of Senators in any State of the Union, if we are given the power, and it will be given. The Federal Government has had the power for 125 years, but it has lain dormant.

The Government of the United States, through Congress, has never exercised the power given by that clause of the Constitution which you talk so much about. It has been a dead letter. We want to put it in effect in Illinois and in Pennsylvania and in Missouri. We want to put it in action in Kansas and in Colorado. We want to put it in effect in New York. We want to put it in operation wherever that flag floats to the breeze [applause on the Democratic side] and guarantee to the American people honest elections to the United States Senate and to the House of Representatives.

Now, let me digress a little for a minute or two. Let me call your attention to a few things that give me hope. Let me make some observations on the vote in yonder body on the Bristow amendment, an amendment which some gentlemen say was offered for the purpose of killing the measure. I will not say that, because it might be unparliamentary even if true, and besides, in the language of Mark Antony, "Those who did that deed are honorable men and will with reason answer" their constituencies. [Laughter.] Oh, if Senators could only be required to answer at the bar of public opinion to-day, at the time our messenger returns to the Senate the Bristow amendment with our disagreement noted, my word for it, the 44 Senators who voted for it would simultaneously spring to their feet, each vieing with the other for the privilege and honor of moving to recede from the Bristow amendment and to concur in the resolution as it passed the House. The trouble is, the people can not confer with their Senators to-day. But they will before the ides of November, 1912, and do not a single one of you Republicans forget it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Remember, 44 Senators voted against and 44 Senators voted for the Bristow amendment. Those votes, strange to say, came from 30 States. Thirty States cast 44 votes for the amendment, and 30 States cast 44 votes against the Bristow amendment.

On the vote on the Bristow amendment both Senators from 14 States voted for the amendment, and both Senators from 14 States voted against it. The Senators representing 14 States divided, one voting for and one voting against the adoption of the Bristow amendment.

Senators from two States, only one Senator being present from each and voting, voted for the Bristow amendment, and Senators from two other States each having but one Senator present, voted against the Bristow amendment.

That was a peculiar state of affairs. The 14 States whose Senators voted solidly for the Bristow amendment are Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming.

The 14 States whose Senators voted solidly against the amendment of the resolution are Alabama, Florida Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia.

The 2 States represented by 1 Senator each which supported the amendment are Colorado and Vermont.

The 2 States represented by 1 Senator each which opposed the amendment are Maine and South Carolina.

On the passage of the resolution in the House, after having first voted down here by a large majority an amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] similar in all essential respects to the Bristow amendment, the vote was 297 in favor of the resolution, just as reported by your committee, and only 15 against it.

The decisive vote by which the resolution was passed in this House was cast by public servants who were elected last fall and who in April stood before the bar of this House and before Almighty God and swore they would respond to their duties as Representatives. It was a phenomenal vote—297 for the resolution against the pitiful number of 15 against it. I am not going to tell the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] where 2 or 3 of those 15 came from, or even remind him of the fact that some of them came from the city of Chicago, the home of a distinguished member of his political party who has demonstrated that he has more confidence in results obtained through the medium of a jack pot than through a ballot box. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I was one of them. [Applause and laughter.] The gentleman never need stop telling how I voted for fear of hurting my conscience. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; I could not hurt your conscience. [Laughter.] I regret to have to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not saving grace enough in any political party to rescue and save that man from his political sins. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman sees there was not, does he not?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I conscientiously believe that the just God which Patrick Henry said presides over the destiny of nations and to whom he appealed does in fact preside over this Nation, and that some day He will deign to stoop from His great white throne and touch the heart of the gentleman from Illinois and make him respond to what he knows to be right. [Laughter and applause.]

The figures which I gave you a moment ago show that when the vote was taken in the House on the passage of the resolution as reported to the House the Members of this body, chosen at the last election by the people of the various districts in the 30 States represented, in whole or in part, by the 44 Senators who voted for the Bristow amendment, cast 176 votes for the adoption of the resolution and only 14 votes against it, 59 Members being absent or paired with absentees.

The vote in this House of Members representing the 14 States whose Senators voted solidly for the Bristow amendment was 82 for and only 11 against the resolution in the exact form reported by your committee.

The vote in this House of the Members representing the 14 States whose Senators divided on the Bristow amendment was 91 for the resolution as reported to the House and only 3 votes against it.

The vote of the Members representing the 2 States which each had only one Senator present and voting for the amendment was 3 votes for the House resolution and none against it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] told us that this House had never gone on record in favor of a resolution in the form of the one we now contend for until we passed it a few days ago. He is mistaken. I call his attention to the fact that a resolution, of which the pending resolution is an exact copy, was introduced in the Fifty-second Congress by a distinguished Democrat from Virginia [Mr. Tucker], and passed the House with the necessary two-third vote, without division or roll call. Of course it failed to pass the Senate. The same resolution, in language exactly like this, was again introduced in the Fifty-third Congress by Mr. Tucker, and passed on a roll call by a vote of 141 for to 50 against it. It may also be interesting to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to know that among those who voted for the resolution in the Fifty-third Congress were ex-Speaker Henderson, Hon. W. P. Hepburn, Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT, and Hon. H. S. Cooper, all prominent and distinguished Republicans, whom Democrats forced to meet the issue, and who had courage enough to discard all other considerations and vote the will of the people they represented.

Mr. Speaker, Members of this House know they will have to show their constituents by their votes that they are sincerely in harmony with the public sentiment which demands the passage of this resolution for the direct election of Senators by the people, and pass it in a form which will be acceptable to the States, if they hope to ever come back here again after Speaker CLARK is elected President, and—— [Prolonged applause and cheering.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I do not think my time ought to be curtailed by this unnecessary and unusual demonstration. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to concur.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 171, answered "present" 9, not voting 97, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur fails because two-thirds have failed to vote for it, and that carries with it the vote to disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Do I understand the Chair to rule that it is unnecessary to make the motion to disagree?

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair holds.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the Chair should put the motion to the House to disagree to the Senate amendment, that would not hurt anything, would it?

The SPEAKER. It would not, except that you might accidentally lose it, and then what? [Laughter.] At first the Chair was inclined to take the gentleman's view of it, but after consultation with the parliamentary clerk and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, and finally with the great authority on parliamentary law, Mr. HINDS, of Maine, we all agreed that the failure of the motion to concur was equivalent to a motion to disagree.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think we can safely leave the situation as it is, then; I have implicit confidence in the Speaker and in his parliamentary clerk, as well as in the gentleman from Maine, who formerly held that position. I understand that there is agreement among them that no further motion is necessary. Now, if there should be error in that, and it should be called to our attention from the other end of the Capitol, we would have a chance to take action, because the longer this thing goes the stronger the situation will become.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman that there can be no condition of affairs arising in the Senate of that kind, because the message which the House sends to the Senate will be that the House does not concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to concur in the Senate amendment.

PURE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce (H. Doc. No. 75):

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your attention is respectfully called to the necessity of passing at this session an amendment to the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat., 768), which will supplement existing law and prevent the shipment in interstate and foreign commerce and the manufacture and sale within the Territories and the District of Columbia of worthless nostrums labeled with misstatements of fact as to their physiological action—misstatements false and misleading even in the knowledge of those who make them.

On June 30, 1906, after an agitation of 20 years, the food and drugs act, passed by the Fifty-ninth Congress, received the approval of the President and became law. The purpose of the measure was twofold—first, to prevent the adulteration of foods and drugs within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; and, second, to prevent any false labeling of foods and drugs that will deceive the people into the belief that they are securing other than that for which they ask and which they have the right to get. The law was received with general satisfaction and has been vigorously enforced. More than 2,000 cases have been prepared for criminal prosecution against the shippers of adulterated or misbranded foods and drugs, and seizures have been made of more than 700 shipments of such articles. More than two-thirds of these cases have been begun since March 4, 1909. Of the criminal cases more than 800 have terminated favorably to the Government, and of the shipments seized more than 450 have been condemned and either relabeled or destroyed. In every case in which the food seized was deleterious to health it was destroyed. A large number of cases are now pending.

The Supreme Court has held in a recent decision (United States v. O. A. Johnson, opinion May 29, 1911) that the food and drugs act does not cover the knowingly false labeling of nostrums as to curative effect or physiological action, and that inquiry under this salutary statute does not by its terms extend in any case to the inefficacy of medicines to work the cures claimed for them on the labels. It follows that, without fear of punishment under the law, unscrupulous persons, knowing the medicines to have no curative or remedial value for the diseases for which they indicate them, may ship in interstate commerce medicines composed of substances possessing any slight physiological action and labeled as cures for diseases which, in the present state of science, are recognized as incurable.

An evil which menaces the general health of the people strikes at the life of the Nation. In my opinion, the sale of dangerously adulterated drugs, or the sale of drugs under knowingly false claims as to their effect in disease, constitutes such an evil and warrants me in calling the matter to the attention of the Congress.

Fraudulent misrepresentations of the curative value of nostrums not only operate to defraud purchasers, but are a distinct menace to the public health. There are none so credulous as sufferers from disease. The need is urgent for legislation which will prevent the raising of false hopes of speedy cures of serious ailments by misstatements of fact as to worthless mixtures on which the sick will rely while their diseases progress unchecked.

At the time the food and drugs act was passed there were current in commerce literally thousands of dangerous frauds labeled as cures for every case of epilepsy, sure cures for consumption and all lung diseases, cures for all kidney, liver, and malarial troubles, cures for diabetes, cures for tumor and cancer, cures for all forms of heart disease; in fact, cures for all the ills known at the present day. The labels of many of these so-called cures indicated their use for diseases of children. They were not only utterly useless in the treatment of the disease, but in many cases were positively injurious. If a tithe of these statements had been true, no one with access to the remedies which bore them need have died from any cause other than accident or old age. Unfortunately, the statements were not true. The shameful fact is that those who deal in such preparations know they are deceiving credulous and ignorant unfortunates who suffer from some of the gravest ills to which the flesh of this day is subject. No physician of standing in his profession, no matter to what school of medicine he may belong, entertains the slightest idea that any of these preparations will work the wonders promised on the labels.

Prior to the recent decision of the Supreme Court the officers charged with the enforcement of the law regarded false and misleading statements concerning the curative value of nostrums as misbranding, and there was a general acquiescence in this view by the proprietors of the nostrums. Many pretended cures, in consequence, were withdrawn from the market, and the proprietors of many other alleged cures eliminated false and extravagant claims from their labels, either voluntarily or under the compulsion of criminal prosecution. Nearly 100 criminal prosecutions on this charge were concluded in the Federal courts by pleas of guilty and the imposition of fines. More than 150 cases of the same nature, involving some of the rankest frauds by which the American people were ever deceived, are pending now, and must be dismissed.

I fear, if no remedial legislation be granted at this session, that the good which has already been accomplished in regard to these nostrums will be undone, and the people of the country will be deprived of a powerful safeguard against dangerous frauds. Of course, as pointed out by the Supreme Court, any attempt to legislate against mere expressions of opinion would be abortive; nevertheless, if knowingly false misstatements of fact as to the effect of the preparations be provided against, the greater part of the evil will be subject to control.

The statute can be easily amended to include the evil I have described. I recommend that this be done at once as a matter of emergency.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 20, 1911.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire the number of copies of this message that are printed under the rules?

I now ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD my reasons for favoring that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY—THE ROOT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the so-called Root amendment to the Canadian reciprocity bill (H. R. 4412).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection. During the remarks of Mr. MANN, his time having expired, by unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. LONGWORTH, he was granted time in which to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few remarks about the pulp and paper provision in the Canadian reciprocity bill and the so-called Root amendment thereto. The reciprocity bill as it passed the House contained the following provision:

SEC. 2. Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

The Root amendment proposes to add at the end of the foregoing the following words:

And when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that such wood pulp, paper, and board, being the products of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

So that the section as amended would read as follows:

SEC. 2. Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board; and when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that such wood pulp, paper, and board, being the products of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

The amendment would be in better grammatical form if a comma instead of a semicolon were inserted at the end of the present section and the word "and," in the beginning of the amendment, were left out. In other words, the meaning of the amendment is that certain paper, and so forth, shall be admitted into the United States on certain conditions named, when the President proclaims that the same articles are admitted into Canada free of duty without any conditions.

The other day even the Chicago Tribune made this statement editorially:

The adoption of the Root amendment to the reciprocity bill would make it conform to the reciprocity agreement in the one particular in which it was departed from by the House, and yet the amendment should not be adopted.

I have seen a similar statement by others. When papers and men usually so well informed get so wide of the mark, correction should be made. The Root amendment is not in conformity with the reciprocity agreement. The Root amendment violates the agreement.

I prepared the original draft of the provision in the reciprocity agreement which sets forth the condition precedent upon which paper might be brought from Canada into the United States free of duty, and I prepared the provision in the reciprocity bill in reference to pulp and paper, and the provision in the bill absolutely follows the provision in the agreement.

The Root amendment destroys the agreement as to pulp and paper. It renders the agreement entirely nugatory. It completely prevents the importation of paper free from Canada, or of paper into Canada from here free. It would be plainer than the Root amendment, but no more effective, if we should add at the end of the pulp and paper provision in the bill the further provision, "This section shall never take effect," because that is the practical effect of the Root amendment.

In order to understand the Root amendment it is necessary to understand the situation.

We consume large quantities of print paper. We obtain that paper from our mills in this country and from the Canadian mills.

Print paper is made from the wood of the spruce tree, and before manufacture that wood is called pulp wood. We are the principal consumers of print paper, and spruce pulp wood is mainly found in Canadian forests.

Portions of the Canadian forests are owned in private ownership, but the bulk of the Canadian forests are publicly owned, are called Crown lands, and are owned by the Provinces of Canada. The Province that owns pulp-wood forests owns them absolutely and can dispose of them as it pleases. These Provinces have put a prohibition on the exportation of pulp wood in the manner following.

The Province of Quebec, for instance, owning large pulp-wood forests, sells the right to cut pulp wood under a contract which provides that the pulp wood shall be manufactured within the Dominion of Canada. The Province will not sell any pulp wood on other terms, and hence under the new order of that Province no pulp wood can be cut in the Crown-land forests to be exported into the United States for the use of our paper mills here. The Province of Ontario and other Provinces have adopted similar restrictive contracts.

It is to the interest of this country that we be able to obtain spruce pulp wood from Canada. It is to the interest of Canada that she be able to send her print paper here free of duty. That being the situation, the reciprocity agreement provided that paper might come into the United States from Canada free of duty if made from pulp wood which itself might have been brought from Canada here. This provision is put in the form of admitting Canadian paper free of duty on the condition precedent that there is no restriction or prohibition of the exportation from Canada of the wood from which the paper is made.

The terms of the agreement would admit paper here free of duty if made from wood cut from the private forests, because there is no restriction on the exportation from Canada of pulp wood cut on the privately owned lands. The agreement would admit paper made from Crown land pulp wood if the Province which owned the forest allowed the exportation of the wood to the United States when cut; but if the Province prohibited the exportation of the pulp wood, then the paper which is made from that pulp wood would not be admitted free here.

The agreement leaves each Province to determine for itself whether it will accede to the condition precedent and take advantage of the offer we make to admit the paper free if the Province permits the pulp wood to come over here. The Dominion Government has no control over the pulp-wood forests in the eastern Provinces, and it is a matter solely for each Province to determine for itself.

It will be noted that the condition precedent is a condition which we impose upon Canadian paper; that it is a condition precedent for the benefit of our people. It is to secure to us pulp wood from Canada.

In other words, Canada desired the admission of pulp and paper into the United States free of duty. Such free entry would be of great advantage to Canadian manufacturers. On our side, we desired to obtain the right of free exportation from Canada of pulp wood in order to supply our mills with raw material for the making of pulp and paper. This right of free exportation, however, so far as the Crown lands are concerned, is not controlled by the Canadian Government. It is controlled by the various Provinces, and the General Dominion Government is powerless to legislate concerning the control of these lands or the pulp wood cut on them. This situation was appreciated by the Canadian commissioners when, in their letter to the Secretary of State, they said, referring to the importation of pulp and paper:

> We note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands. The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative. Whether the provincial governments will desire to in any way modify their regulations with a view to securing the free admission of pulp and paper from their Provinces into the markets of the United States must be a question for the provincial authorities to decide. In the meantime the present duties on pulp and paper imported from the United States into Canada will remain. Whenever pulp and paper of the classes already mentioned are admitted into the United States free of duty from all parts of Canada, then similar articles, when imported from the United States, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

In other words, the Canadian officials said that, as the United States was proposing in the agreement to insert a condition precedent which involved future action by the different Canadian Provinces, pending such action by the Provinces, the provisions of the agreement for free entry would be inoperative as to pulp and paper affected by the condition precedent coming from any Province until that Province had changed its regulations or form of contract. They further said, in effect, that until all of the Canadian Provinces permitted free exportation of pulp wood, meanwhile the present duty on pulp and paper imported into Canada would remain.

The meaning of the agreement is further expressed in Schedule A, attached to the agreement, which is practically in the language of the reciprocity bill as it passed the House, and which provides that the pulp and paper therein described, when imported from Canada into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty on the condition precedent that no export duty or fee or any prohibition or restriction of exportation by contract or otherwise shall have been imposed upon such pulp or paper or the wood used in their manufacture.

The Crown land pulp wood and the private land pulp wood are in competition in Canada. If we let in paper made from the private land pulp wood free and charge a duty of $5.75 a ton on paper made from the Crown land pulp wood, the Crown land pulp wood will be at such a disadvantage that the Province which is the owner of it will naturally seek to secure the same benefits for the Crown land pulp wood that the private land pulp wood enjoys, and therefore take off the prohibition on exportation.

The reciprocity agreement further provides that if the time comes when we admit paper from all parts of Canada free, then Canada shall admit our paper free, and that provision of the agreement is incorporated in the measure now pending in the Canadian Parliament. The real advantage to us, however, is not in securing the admission of our paper into Canada free, because that will amount to but little.

The real advantage to us in the agreement will be the securing of the right to obtain pulp wood from Canada—pulp wood that is cut on her Crown lands which we can not now obtain. The agreement, however, does not make the admission of paper into the United States free of duty dependent in any way upon the admission of our paper into Canada free of duty. The Canadian Government would jump at the chance to admit our paper into Canada free of duty in return for our admission of Canadian paper here free of duty. But in the agreement we do not propose to admit all Canadian paper free of duty at once, nor ever, unless all of the restrictions or prohibitions on the exportation of pulp wood are removed in the different Provinces.

The Root amendment proposes that we shall not admit any paper from Canada free of duty until Canada admits all of our paper, of the kind described in the agreement, into Canada free of duty.

If the Root amendment prevails, this would be the situation: We would not admit any paper free of duty unless the pulp wood from which it was made might have been exported to us.

Hence, we would not admit all paper from a Province free of duty until that Province had removed the restriction on exportation.

Hence, we would not admit all paper from Canada free of duty until the restrictions on exportation were removed in every Province of Canada.

Hence, so long as any Province maintains its prohibition on exportation of pulp wood, we would not admit all paper from Canada free of duty. [Applause.]

Hence, Canada would not admit our paper free of duty, because we would not admit all of the Canadian paper free of duty.

And hence, under the Root amendment, we would not admit any paper from Canada free of duty, because Canada does not admit all of our paper free of duty.

As the Root amendment provides that the pulp and paper provision in the act shall not take effect until Canada admits all of our paper free of duty, and as Canada does not, under the terms of the agreement, admit our paper free of duty until we admit all of her paper free of duty, and as we have a provision or condition precedent in the act to the effect that we will not admit paper coming from a Province free of duty if made from pulp wood that might not have been exported to us, we would leave it within the power of any one Province in Canada to prevent the taking effect of any portion of these provisions and thereby prevent the admission of any paper free merely by refusing to remove the restriction it makes in its contract on the exportation of pulp wood. If this power be left in each individual Province of Canada, it is absolutely certain that the provision in the act is not worth the paper it is written on.

If Ontario, for instance, has the power, by refusing to permit the exportation of its pulp wood, to keep the law from having any effect, it will exercise that power, and under the Root amendment that Province would have such power.

The agreement proceeds on the theory that we admit certain paper free of duty in return for the prospect of being able to import the Crown land pulp wood without restriction.

The agreement is based on the idea that it is worth more to us to secure Crown land pulp wood than it is to have the right to send paper to Canada free of duty. It is impossible to make the condition precedent we propose work in harmony with the Root amendment.

It is impossible to make effective both the Root amendment and the condition precedent so far as accomplishing results are concerned.

If, however, the manufacturers of print paper do not care to obtain the right to secure Crown land pulp wood, but prefer instead to obtain the right to export paper to Canada, that result can be reached in a very simple manner.

We can simply strike out the condition precedent and provide in the act that we will admit pulp and paper coming from Canada free when Canada admits our pulp and paper going there free.

While I do not believe such a provision is to the interest of the paper manufacturers of the United States, yet if they prefer to have the right to export paper to Canada rather than the right to obtain Canadian pulp wood, I do not know that I would object to the proposition. The bill might then provide, leaving out the condition precedent, that we will admit pulp and paper of the character described in the bill—when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that such wood pulp, paper, and board, being the products of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

This latter language is the exact language of the Root amendment. If such a provision were enacted, it would simply leave out of consideration all question in regard to obtaining pulp wood and would provide for reciprocity in pulp and paper on even terms.

But, of course, under such a provision, the Canadian Provinces would still maintain their prohibition against the exportation of pulp wood, and though by the provision we would obtain the right to export paper to Canada free of duty, it is perfectly plain that we would not have the paper to export. Our own supply of spruce pulp wood would soon be gone and the paper industry would be transferred to Canada.

If the paper manufacturers desire to cut off their supply of Canadian pulp wood and transfer the print-paper-making industry to Canada, all they need to do is to keep on urging the Root amendment, and they will probably be accommodated by a provision for simple, plain, reciprocity on paper between the United States and Canada, without any reference to pulp wood or our obtaining pulp wood from Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the pulp and paper section as we passed it will greatly benefit the American reader, the American school children, the American newspaper, the American manufacturer of news-print paper, the Canadian manufacturer of news-print paper, the Canadian owner of pulp wood, and the Canadian pulp-wood forests. It tends to make available the raw material and to prevent undue increase in price of the finished product; but the Root amendment will render the whole provision ineffective and of no value. It practically destroys the agreement. Its adoption would put up the price of print paper in the United States and would prevent our obtaining the raw material from Canada.

Canada has the great pulp-wood forests; we have the great consuming public. The pulp-wood forests of Canada are of little value unless we furnish a market for the product into which they may be converted. We are great consumers of the paper into which the Canadian forests may be converted. Common sense dictates that we enter into an arrangement which is mutually profitable both to us and to Canada.

The Root amendment would prevent this. It would keep the Canadian pulp-wood forests and the American paper consumer far apart. It would be of no benefit to anyone, except those paper mills in the United States which own a temporary supply of spruce pulp-wood forests and which hope to convert them into paper at high prices during the next few years, leaving the future to look out for itself. That is neither statesmanship nor wise economy.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not request time of the House this afternoon to reply to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in reference to his attack upon the Root amendment, but inasmuch as the amendment was offered by the distinguished senior Senator from the State of New York, and as the district which I have the honor to represent is mightily interested in the subject, I ask the indulgence of the House that I be permitted to file for printing in the RECORD within five days such remarks as I may be able to get together in relation thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print within five days remarks on the subject of pulp wood and print paper. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. This afternoon the House nonconcurred in the Senate amendment to House joint resolution 39 respecting the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. My recollection of the parliamentary proceeding is that when the House nonconcurs in a Senate amendment we usually ask for a conference. Apparently we did not do that this afternoon, and I would like to inquire what physically now becomes of the House joint resolution? Is it messaged to the Senate?

The SPEAKER. It is sent back to the Senate.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the Senate must now ask for a conference?

The SPEAKER. If there is one; yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is that proceeding regular?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Chair will state that he inquired into it as particularly as it was possible to do, and he came to the conclusion, against his own first impression, that the procedure that was had was the correct procedure, and the message that will be sent to the Senate is that the House refuses to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I would like to state to the gentleman from Kansas that as there was an even division in the vote in the Senate on this proposition, and as those who voted against concurring desired the Senate to have an opportunity to vote on the proposition as to whether they should recede or not before a conference was asked, the House did not ask for a conference for that reason, but leaves it to the Senate to determine by another vote in the Senate as to whether they will recede from their amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then this proceeding, I understand from the gentleman from Alabama, is not the regular proceeding?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very often.

The SPEAKER. This proceeding has been pursued; that is, a vote to disagree and send back has been done a dozen times.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that this will add to the gayety of nations, but does the gentleman from Alabama contend now that the Senate, by a majority vote, can recede from its amendment and adopt the resolution without a two-thirds vote in the Senate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do; I do not think it requires a two-thirds vote for the final vote.

Mr. MANN. But the final vote has been had; that is the final vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But when the House sends it back to the Senate it is in dispute between the two Houses.

Mr. MANN. But if the Senate recedes it is a final vote, and it must take a two-thirds vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois this discussion is purely academic.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; we do not have to state that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And if we agree to a conference, after it went back to the Senate from conference the Senate, by a majority vote, could disagree or could agree, and I do not think that this changes the situation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I agree, anyway; it does not affect the procedure between the two Houses whether we ask for a conference or not.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama in that case where and in what way would the Senate by a two-thirds vote adopt the House proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the Senate decide that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it receded there would be no vote on the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. By a majority vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it would have to be adopted by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could recede by a majority vote.

Mr. MANN. If the Senate recedes by a majority vote that ends the matter between the two Houses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They can adopt the resolution——

Mr. MANN. That can only be by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, the purpose in the Senate is not to recede alone, but, as I understand it, there are some gentlemen in the Senate who desire to recede with an amendment, and if the Senate recedes with an amendment, why after the amendment is adopted by a majority vote, of course there will be a two-thirds vote required if the amendment comes back to the House.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will designate Mr. FLOOD of Virginia to preside on Saturday for eulogies on the late Senator DANIEL.

ADJOURNMENT.

The UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I have prepared and which I desire to offer to the bill, but there are amendments of the committee, and I observe that members of the committee are now absent. For that reason, I ask that the bill may go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Let the bill go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

LIGHTHOUSE PROPERTY.

The bill (S. 2053) providing for the disposition of moneys recovered on account of injury or damage to lighthouse property was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter all moneys recovered on account of injury or damage to lighthouse property shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the proper appropriations for repair and maintenance of works under the control of the Bureau of Lighthouses for the fiscal year in which said deposits are made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT ON TARIFF-REVISION BILLS.

Mr. PENROSE. Out of order, as I just came into the Chamber, I ask unanimous consent to make a report from a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool with a negative recommendation. (S. Rept. 85.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. An adverse report?

Mr. PENROSE. An adverse report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the Senator's request for action? Indefinite postponement?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; that is the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the bill may go to the calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The bill should take its place on the calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it go to the calendar.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill will go on the calendar, with the adverse report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ordinarily on an adverse report a bill is indefinitely postponed, but, of course, it goes to the calendar on request.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the same committee to report back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles. (S. Rept. 84.)

Mr. NELSON. Let that bill go on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask if the bill just reported will take the place of the former bill and go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in this connection and at this time I desire to congratulate the Finance Committee of the Senate on the expedition which it has displayed respecting these two measures just reported to the Senate. I desire to congratulate that committee upon the facility which it has just exhibited in transacting the business with which it has been charged by the Senate.

This early report on these two important measures will command the universal approbation of the American people, and if the Finance Committee has, either with or without cause, forfeited the confidence of this country, that confidence will be in great measure restored by the prompt and patriotic action which that committee has just taken.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee of the Sixty-second Congress has demonstrated that it has not only as much facility for the discharge of the public business, but it has demonstrated that it has as much patriotism as the Finance Committee of the Sixty-first Congress. The Finance Committee of the Sixty-first Congress reported the Payne-Aldrich bill after a deliberation of two days. As suggested on yesterday, that important measure, involving, I believe, 13 schedules, involving 4,000 items, was sent to that committee on April 10, and on April 12 that measure was reported to the Senate of the United States with the recommendation that it should be passed. On yesterday it was a problem as to whether the Finance Committee having reported 13 schedules in 2 days the same committee could report one schedule after a deliberation of 20 days. In a spirit of patriotism, highly commendable, the Finance Committee has demonstrated its capacity to emulate the expedition of its predecessor in the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. President, I will not even intimate that this great committee, consisting of the most distinguished Members of this Senate, has been pouting over night; I will not intimate that it has refused "to play in anybody's back yard" or in anybody's front yard.

On yesterday I felt impelled by sentiments of self-respect to submit a few observations touching the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and those of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but the Senate was making such splendid progress that I was unwilling to interrupt the procession to vindicate myself.

Mr. President, to me it is painful to be regarded as unfair by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire; it is equally painful to be regarded as unreasonable by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania; I set a high value upon their good opinion; but I was not insensible to the compliment intended by the remark of the chairman of the Finance Committee when he observed that the motion which I had the honor to submit was conceived in shallow demagogism.

Mr. President, I would rather be the object than the author of such a suggestion. I will not, and I would not, retaliate in kind. I would not, and I will not, descend to bandy charges with the Senator from Pennsylvania, though I conceive myself equal to that ungracious task. I do not believe in a reciprocity of epithets, certainly not in this high forum. Epithets are never resorted to until arguments are exhausted. I would not even say, Mr. President, that the authorship of the criticism in great measure moderates the sting of the criticism.

Mr. President, if an enduring hostility to Schedule K, if a deep and abiding desire to reduce the extortionate duties of Schedule K, if a steadfast and unfaltering wish to emancipate the American consumer from the joint tyranny of the shepherd and the weaver—if that answers the Senator's definition of demagogue, then, sir, I must own the harsh impeachment.

Mr. President, I am unwilling to be unfair to the Finance Committee of the United States Senate; I am as unwilling to be unfair to that great committee as I am unwilling that the tariff legislation of the United States should be unfair to 90,000,000 consumers; but if I should ever be driven to the disagreeable necessity of choosing between unfairness to that illustrious committee and unfairness to the American people, I could not and I would not hesitate in my choice. I would select that horn of the dilemma which seemed to me most compatible with my conscience, my convictions, and my sense of public duty.

It is not my purpose here or now to embark upon a discussion of Schedule K. I am not willing to be unfair either to the producer of wool or to the manufacturer of woolen and worsted goods. This is a great industry, one of the leading industries of the United States, built up behind a wall of protection. To my mind the wall is too high; it was conceived in injustice; it has been builded in injustice; it has been fraught with injury and injustice to the American people; but, sir, I would not abolish a wrong system by means that are revolutionary or destructive. These duties, too high, should be reduced gradually. We should come down upon the lock-and-dam system, allowing business to adjust itself to the changed conditions, doing no violence and no needless injury to any industry in the United States. That is my own feeling in the premises, and I feel sure that that sentiment is shared by my associates on this side of the Chamber. I do not believe it will be difficult to demonstrate that the rates of the wool schedule are too high.

Mr. President, I was in Canada last autumn. While there I bought an article of wearing apparel known as a pony jacket No. 5. For that article I paid $2.50, retail, in Windsor, Canada. Upon that article I paid a tariff duty of $1.94 to introduce that article of necessity into the land of the free. I have here the bill from the merchant, and I have the customhouse receipt. That article cost me $4.44 duty paid, although it was worth only $2.50 in Canada; and the merchant who owned it and who sold it in Canada required me to pay only $2.50 for the article.

Mr. President, that garment was manufactured by the Monarch Knitting Co., which has mills situated at Buffalo, N. Y., and at St. Catherines, Canada. According to my information, pony jacket No. 5 wholesales in Canada at $21 a dozen. I hold in my hand the Dry Goods Economist of October 29, 1910, which contains an advertisement of the Monarch Woolen Co. According to this advertisement pony jacket No. 5 wholesales in the United States for $42 a dozen, while they wholesale in the Dominion at only $21 a dozen. They wholesale in the United States at the rate of $3.50 a piece, and they retail in Canada at $2.50 a piece, the wholesale price in the United States being $1 more than the retail price in the Dominion of Canada.

I do not know, Mr. President, how long a hearing would be necessary to convince the senior Senator from New Hampshire that the rates in Schedule K are too high. I do not know how long a time would be required to convince him that an article which retails in Canada at $2.50 ought not to wholesale in the United States at $3.50. I wish that the Senator and myself might survive until he is convinced that Schedule K is too high; I had almost said that I wished that he and I might afford the country the benefit of our services in the United States Senate until he is convinced that Schedule K is too high.

I have other articles on which the disparity is just as glaring, but I shall not take the time of the Senate now to demonstrate that the American consumer is subjected to unreasonable exactions through the operation of Schedule K.

I am aware, Mr. President, of the fundamental difference between the views of myself and those of the Senator from New Hampshire. He thinks the system is right—nay, sir, he thinks the system is holy and is consecrated—and he warns Senators not to lay a profane hand upon the temple of protection; but, sir, I am much mistaken if the veil of that temple is not already rent in twain, although in view of ancient and consecrated wrath there are those of us who hesitate to decide whether in revising Schedule K we are really desecrating the shrine or, may I say, "demolishing a den." I think, sir, that I quote the last words from an authority that will challenge the respect of Senators on the other side.

Mr. President, I do not believe in a protective tariff; and I agree with my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in my opposition to even incidental protection for protection's sake. I am not willing to listen to the song of that siren. The sole object of a protective tariff is to enable the producer to get more for what he sells than he could get without the tariff. It does not always succeed; that is not always the effect; but, sir, that is always the intention. I do not believe that this Government, I do not believe that any government, has the right to give any man the privilege to charge more for a thing than the thing is worth.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORE. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. Just for a question. The Senator from Oklahoma has given to us the retail price in Canada of a certain article, and he has also given us the wholesale price for that same article in the United States, the increase being due to the tariff duty. May I ask the Senator whether that was one of the tariff duties that was framed by the majority of the Finance Committee in secret session?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the duty was maintained by the Finance Committee of the Senate in secret session. That committee at that time, however, regarded Schedule K as the keystone in the arch of protection; it regarded Schedule K as the ark of the covenant of protection; and it dared not lay the profaning hand upon that ark lest the lightnings from an enraged protected interest would strike the then omnipotent majority from its place of power and authority in the Senate. My recollection is that they did not even consider, that they did not even discuss, a revision of Schedule K. The chairman of the Finance Committee during that debate observed upon this floor that Schedule K was "the citadel of protection." Nay, sir, I believe he denominated it as the keystone of the arch, and no one would venture then, as none of his kind would venture now, to lay the hand of revision upon that consecrated schedule.

Mr. President, I am equally opposed to undue precipitation and to undue delay in the revision of the tariff. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] were correct on yesterday when they did the committee the compliment of saying that it could report within 20 days, but I suspect that neither of them was so sanguine as to imagine that we would be favored with a report upon the morrow. That they have done so is only another tribute to the activity of that committee when impelled by a sense of patriotic duty to the long-suffering consumers of the United States.

I intend to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] objected to this "unseemly haste." He desired time for deliberation. No prophet could forecast the æons of time which would be required by the Senator from Idaho to revise his views upon this sacred schedule. The Senator said that the existing law had been in effect only the brief and fleeting period of two years. He asked why the United States Senate should be required with such undignified haste to reverse its action of only two years ago; he challenged us to present some reasons for the reversal of our attitude upon this important legislation. I shall venture to oblige him to the extent of suggesting only one reason—that is, that 93,000,000 people have condemned the Payne-Aldrich Act of two years ago.

If the 93,000,000 people of the United States favored that legislation then, they condemn that legislation now. That condemnation was registered in the most expressive and eloquent way by the American electorate in the congressional elections of last November. It occurred to me, and it occurred to my associates on this side, that if 93,000,000 people could reverse their position in one year and six months, 91 Senators of the United States ought to be able to face about within a period of two years; and for that reason, responding to the demand of the American people, we have ventured to challenge Schedule K.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to retard the progress of the Canadian agreement in its pilgrimage through the Senate. I shall vote for the Canadian agreement. I am sensible that it goes further than our Republican friends would have gone. I am equally sensible that it does not go so far as my Democratic associates would have gone. For my part, I would have placed flour as well as wheat, and dressed meats as well as cattle, on the free list. But, Mr. President, in my opinion a protective tariff on one article is wrong; a protective duty on two articles is doubly wrong. A protective duty on 4,000 articles is an unspeakable injury and injustice. I would reduce them all, if I could. I will reduce but one if I can not reduce more.

When we remove the protective tariff from one article we render a service to the American consumer. When we remove the protective tariff from two articles we render a twofold service to the consumer. But, sir, with my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, I shall vote to emancipate the people from one burden if those upon the other side refuse to permit us to go further.

I repeat that I have no disposition to defeat the Canadian agreement; I have no disposition to delay the Canadian agreement; I have no disposition to amend the Canadian agreement; and I would strenuously resist any amendment that was either designed or calculated to prove a stumbling stone in the progress of that measure through the Senate.

With the "free list" and the woolen bill slumbering in the committee, with no assurance that either would ever be reported, there might have been some reason for offering those measures as amendments to the Canadian agreement; but, sir, with those two bills on the Senate anvil—with those two bills on the Senate Calendar—there is no reason for attaching those measures to the reciprocity agreement. Let us pass the Canadian agreement; then let us pass the free list and the woolen bill without needless discussion or delay.

No delay can be charged to any Senator upon this side. We are willing to vote now on the Canadian agreement. We are willing to fix a time now to vote upon that agreement. I would yield to any Senator upon the other side to prefer a request now to fix a day and a date for taking the final vote on the Canadian agreement.

Mr. President, neither Senators nor the country can charge, and the country will not charge, any delay to this side of the Senate respecting the Canadian reciprocity agreement. Senators on this side are willing now to fix a day to vote on the free-list bill. I believe Senators on this side are willing now to fix a day, a reasonable day in the future, to vote on the bill revising Schedule K; and I wish to say now that if any growers of wool in the United States, if any manufacturers of woolen fabrics in the United States have any data or suggestions which they wish to submit to the United States Senate or to the American people touching the woolen bill, and they will forward their protest or their approval to myself or to any Senator who voted for the motion on yesterday, that protest will be printed as a public document, to enlighten the Senate, and will render all possible service to those who wish to register their views upon the pending measure.

Mr. President, this Congress was convened in extraordinary session on April 4. We have now been in session during a period of 10 weeks. We have dragged our slow lengths along. During this time the other branch of Congress has passed five important measures. The other House has reported, has considered, has debated, and has passed the Canadian agreement. The other House has reported, has considered, and has passed the free-list bill. The other House has reported, has considered, has discussed, and has passed the bill for the publicity of campaign expenditures. The other House has reported, has considered, has debated, and has passed a constitutional amendment for the direct election of United States Senators. Nay, sir, the other House has considered, reported, and passed a measure for the remodeling of Schedule K.

During that time the Senate of the United States has passed one of those measures, in a form which I fear foreordains its ultimate defeat. But, sir, for 10 weeks—and I regret to say it—the Senate of the United States has marked time. Nay, sir, the Senate of the United States has murdered time. The country has grown weary with waiting. The country wants action now—prompt, enlightened, and patriotic action.

And I know, sir, that the manufacturers of woolen goods and worsted goods desire final action upon the revision of Schedule K. If those duties are to be reduced, in the wisdom of the Senate, they desire to know that now. If that ancient and consecrated shrine is to be maintained, they desire that assurance now. Uncertainty is the evil which vexes the manufacturers this day. They can not buy wool for future delivery. They can not sell woolen fabrics for future delivery, because they do not know upon what basis their calculations are to be made. Free them of this uncertainty, sir, and you will bring peace and confidence to them, and they will soon adjust themselves to the revision of Schedule K, if the Senate and the Congress should be patriotic enough to undertake and execute such a revision.

Now, Mr. President, I must apologize to the Senate for taking its time on this occasion. But I did not feel disposed to embrace the opportunity yesterday, because the team work between this side and a portion of the other side was so magnificent that I could not find it in my heart to interrupt or delay the triumphal march merely to indicate my own motives and my own conduct.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to state in two or three words the attitude of the Finance Committee and the reason for its action to-day.

In the opinion of the majority of the committee it was impracticable to give hearings on this measure within the brief period allowed by the Senate under the motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma. In view of the fact that the majority were persuaded that it would be impossible to conduct hearings with any degree of fairness or with any proper consideration of the measure, it was determined, under the motion adopted by a substantial majority of the Senate, however unprecedented such action may be, that it was useless to hold the bills any longer, and the bills were therefore reported adversely without that full hearing which the vast importance of the subject demanded and without the committee's being able to extend to the scores of persons who have asked for an opportunity to be heard the courtesy usually accorded by committees of the American Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand, the report of the majority is not accompanied with any explanations or views—simply an adverse report. May I ask whether the chairman has been advised as to the probability of a minority report, or, to speak more accurately, a report of the minority views upon these measures?

Mr. PENROSE. There is a general understanding among the members of the Finance Committee that any member on measures of this character reserves the right to file an individual or minority report. Whether that right will be exercised by any members of the committee on this occasion I am not, as chairman of the committee, advised.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PENROSE. I have concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to add my felicitations to those of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the Senate upon the prompt action of the Committee on Finance, and I wish to extend my felicitations to the Senator from Oklahoma upon the authorship of the motion of yesterday which produced so decisive a result.

I regard it as one of the most significant events that has taken place during my service in this Chamber. I regard it as an indication that the old deference to committees, under the guise of senatorial courtesy, which so long has protected existing abuses in legislation, has been ameliorated. And now, Mr. President, inasmuch as this action has produced so decisive a result regarding the woolen schedule I wish to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the importance of now determining upon a program of legislation for the extra session.

It is likely that this session will be a long one. There is no probability of an early adjournment. There is no reason why, when the decks are clear as to legislation relating to appropriations, we should not take up numerous measures of legislation regarding which public opinion is now made up.

CONGRESS LAGGING BEHIND PUBLIC OPINION—LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM.

Congress has lagged far behind public opinion. I am sometimes accused in the Senate of being 10 years ahead of my time in my views regarding legislation. My only reply to that is that I am not ahead of my time, I am simply abreast of the times, but that the Senate and Congress in their action are 10, 20 years behind the times and the demands of an intelligent public opinion.

On the 11th day of May, within a month after the extra session commenced, I presented to the Senate a resolution prescribing a program of legislation relating not only to measures which should be taken up for immediate legislative action, but measures which should be considered in committee with a view to report early in the next regular session, so that prompt action could then be taken upon them.

Now, what were the subjects which I suggested should be taken up for legislative action at this session? They were nine:

First. The Canadian reciprocity bill.

Second. Enlarging the free list of importations.

Third. The reduction of the excessive duties in the wool, cotton, and steel schedules.

Fourth. The gradual reduction of all duties of a prohibitory character to a revenue basis.

Fifth. The immediate reduction of the appropriations for military and naval expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, to the extent of $30,000,000, such reduction to be apportioned by the President with the aid of a military board or boards.

Sixth. A graduated increase in the corporation tax sufficient to make up any deficit caused by a reduction in customs duties, and also sufficient to provide a fund for the regulation of river flow and the promotion of river navigation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

INCREASE OF CORPORATION TAX.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that I am heartily in accord with that suggestion, but when that time comes we must duly increase the revenue by taxing the trusts and subjecting them to the corporation tax. The Senator will remember that they were stricken out in conference two years ago.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That tax can be made a graduated tax in such a way as not to be oppressive to the small corporations and yet insure a fair revenue from the great combinations of capital, a revenue which will make up for any temporary deficit caused by the reduction of the tariff duties.

The resolution proceeds:

Seventh. Publicity of campaign expenditures before the election and prohibiting contributions by corporations.

Eighth. Providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote.

Ninth. Providing for the immediate admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States.

Mr. President, when that resolution was offered in the Senate a broad smile passed over the faces of most Senators here at the suggestion of so large a program. Yet, as a matter of fact, the House of Representatives has already acted upon six of the nine measures covered by this resolution, and bills passed by them are now knocking at our doors and demanding recognition.

It is true they have not yet acted regarding a graduated increase in the corporation tax, and yet I take it, if as the result of our legislation here it is ascertained that there will be a substantial reduction in revenue, it will be the duty of the dominant party in the House to suggest some method of increasing that revenue. Until the constitutional amendment is adopted with reference to an income tax, obviously a graduated increase in the corporation tax, striking largely at the great trusts and combinations to which the Senator has referred, would be the easiest and most direct method of proceeding.

Mr. President, what were the other measures which that resolution suggested, a resolution which is now pending and which I trust will receive favorable action? What were the other measures suggested in that resolution upon which committee action, not legislative action, was desirable in advance of the legislation of the next session, so that at the very commencement of the session in December next we could enter upon this great work of reform and constructive legislation?

The first one was a measure concerning which public opinion is fully made up, with reference to which I undertake to say there will hardly be a division in the Senate, though it has been vigorously fought hitherto, the physical valuation of the railroads of the country by the Interstate Commerce Commission, for what public man can face his constituents claiming any credit for consistency or integrity who will say that when the Supreme Court has determined that the valuation of the railroads is a factor in the determination of rates, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not be fully provided with the machinery for making such valuation, conspicuously so in the face of the statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission that within one year one great system of the country raised its proof of the value of a railroad about $150,000,000 more than they had alleged that value to be a year before.

PROPOSED BOARD OF INTERSTATE TRADE.

What is the second one which I suggested? I suggested legislation providing, in connection with the Bureau of Corporations, for a board of interstate trade, with powers of examination, correction, and recommendation with regard to interstate trade similar to those conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding interstate transportation. This resolution was offered before the recent decision of the Supreme Court regarding the trusts, and I then declared that whatever might be the decision of that court the creation of such a commission was essential. Interstate trade is just as much a part of interstate commerce as interstate transportation. The abuses of interstate trade have become just as great as the abuses of interstate transportation in the past have been. Obviously the teachings of experience lead us to the organization of a commission or board similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission, with a view of taking hold of the great combinations of capital and making them obedient to the law, giving such a commission powers of examination, recommendation, and condemnation similar to those enjoyed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Since that decision the trust managers themselves have seen a great light and in public examinations have stated that in their judgment the time has come for as complete regulation of corporations engaged in interstate trade as of corporations engaged in interstate transportation. Whether that regulation will ever extend so far as the regulation of the price itself is a matter to be determined in the future, for Congress will be called upon to decide how great these corporations shall be, what the extent of their capital shall be, what number of plants they shall own, and what shall be the extent of their operations. If they conclude to maintain the principle of competition, even though it leads to destruction, there will then, of course, be no necessity of regulating prices. But if they recognize the principle of helpful cooperation instead of destructive competition, then it will be necessary for them in extreme cases to face the question of the regulation of prices just as the prices of any public utility are regulated.

I do not venture to express an opinion now as to what course should be pursued with reference to this great question, but it is time that the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate were entering upon an inquiry of the most important question in economics that has engaged the attention of the country since the railroad question was first presented to it; and what more appropriate time could we have for such action than during this extra session of Congress, when but one committee of the Senate is actively engaged and all other committees are idle, and our decks are clear of obstructive legislation, such as appropriation bills, and when there is ample time and leisure for the conduct of this inquiry?

PREVENTION OF BANK PANICS.

The third proposal which I suggested for committee consideration was one providing for the protection of bank depositors and the minimizing of bank panics by the organization of a national reserve association in each State, in which the national banks and the State banks engaged in interstate commerce shall be stockholders, such national reserve associations to have ample capital and reserves and to take over the note-issuing functions now enjoyed by the national banks, including the power to issue emergency currency; such associations to have the power to insure or guarantee the depositors of their constituent banks, and in connection therewith powers of examination of such banks; such associations to be brought into federation through a national banking board fairly representative of the different sections of the country, one-half of which shall be selected by such associations and one-half by the President of the United States; and such board to be advisory to the Congress and to the President.

Of course, this is a mere suggestion as to a line of legislative action, coming from a Democrat who is opposed to the suggestion of a central-bank organization such as is recommended by the former distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. It is incumbent upon the Democratic Party to present some measure in opposition to that measure. It is incumbent upon the Democratic Party to present its view upon this question. Already the banks of the country are being organized for the purpose of carrying through the Aldrich monetary bill. Already the commercial organizations of the country are being exploited upon this subject.

Already public sentiment is being created, and it is absolutely essential for the Democratic Party, if it has any distinctive view upon the subject, to present it now. Why should not this party, both in the Senate and in the House, through its membership in committees be engaged in this work, and why should not the Republican committees of the Senate undertake this work? Thus far we have intrusted it to a monetary commission, originally composed of Members of the Senate and of the House, but by death and the mutations of politics almost every one of the original members on that commission, so far as the Senate is concerned, has departed from public life. So instead of having the members of that commission active Members of this body as our guides, they occupy the position of any other commission with powers of recommendation.

IMPORTANCE OF INTERSTATE EXCHANGE.

Mr. President, so far as the Democratic view of this question is concerned, it seems to me that interstate exchange is just as important a branch of interstate commerce as interstate transportation or interstate trade. We have stood patiently these biennial and decennial paralyses in exchange which have arrested the business of the entire country, and which, as a matter of economics, are just as easily prevented as would be the obstruction of transportation itself.

With what patience would the people of the United States view a process by which the railway cars of the country could be gathered into the city of New York and there used as storehouses for goods, and then when the various sections of the country would call for cars for the moving of the crops New York would deny these cars upon the ground that they were being used as storehouses? And yet that has been practically what has been accomplished in interstate exchange. The circulating medium of the country, absolutely necessary both to transportation and to trade, has been locked up in New York through a vicious system of lending the reserves of the country banks to the great central banks to be loaned out by the latter in speculative promotion and development, thus arresting and obstructing their use when they are required for the exchanges and the trade and the transportation of the country.

This is a great question, involving just as scientific adjustment as that of transportation itself; and yet Congress has done nothing whatever upon this subject under the administration of the Republican Party. For years nothing whatever was done by way of amendment of our banking act except to give the banks larger powers in the increase of credit. No restrictions have been imposed upon them tending to the security of depositors or the prevention of panics.

DEMOCRATIC PLAN OF BANKING REFORM.

In my judgment, the Democratic plan of bank organization should be practically like that of our system of Government, the recognition of each State as an economic unit and the union of the State associations under some plan of federalization. The Aldrich plan absolutely obliterates the States, and creates in their place 16 commercial zones, in which the branch organizations of the central organization are organized. I would substitute for those zones the States themselves, and organize in each one of the States a national reserve association similar to the central national reserval association which the Senator from Rhode Island desires. I would have both the State banks and the national banks organized in these reserve associations within the boundaries of each State as a separate and individual unit, and then having created 46 such associations I would devise some method of federalizing them just as we federalized our State governments by the creation of a National Government. I would find some method of federalizing them through some commission at Washington that would fairly represent all these various States, with powers of recommendation, with powers of examination, and with powers of suggestion, in the hope that ultimately these State organizations thus federalized would, by a process of evolution, fill every useful purpose that could be accomplished by the Aldrich plan.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been quite interested in what the Senator has been stating. Does not the Senator think that if these organizations or zones, so called, were limited to the boundary of a State it would greatly weaken them, and that in case of a panic, a panic sometimes locally, it would be the means of great financial disturbance; that no assistance could come to that organization other than the mere banks within the States, and there would be no advantage in the way of creating a sound, strong banking center?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator that whilst his criticism might apply to some of the smaller States, it would apply to but few, and provision could be made in the bill, if it should be deemed desirable, that the associations in smaller States could tie themselves to associations in the larger States adjoining in such a way as to give them the benefit of cooperation. From a merely economic point of view there may be something in the suggestion of the Senator, that it would be better regardless of State lines, to make these economic zones each tributary to some great financial center to which each part of such zone would look for protection and for defense. But in my judgment it is not practicable, for no measure can be passed, certainly for many years, which does not receive the approval of the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party is now intrenched in power in the House of Representatives, and it will probably remain so. All the indications are of an absolute change in the politics of the Government within the next year. I am addressing myself practically to an economic question which should address itself to the patriotism of both parties, and an economic solution of this question will immensely improve existing conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. I was only advancing an economic point of view. I did not have any political thought in my mind. But the Senator said there would be 46 such organizations, and I took it from that statement that every State in the Union would have an organization, and it seemed to me that in some of the weaker States it would be almost a failure; and, if not a failure, there would be great danger attached to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is always danger, of course, in having a weak point in a chain. The strength of a chain is simply the strength of its weakest link.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

WEAK LINK IN INTERSTATE EXCHANGE.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Utah that the weak link to-day in our chain is shown by the most apt illustration of the Senator from Nevada, that they get all the cars in New York City and use them for storage purposes. In other words, they get the currency and exchange there, and the cause of panic is that the people at large are deprived of the use of it. That is the weak point in the chain. The point to strengthen in the chain is the weak point.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is right; and I hope that legislation will embrace that.

Mr. President, it is not my intention in reviewing the measures which I have suggested for the action of the Senate and the action of the committee to enter exhaustively into the consideration of any one of them, and I will simply pass from this question of bank reform by stating that it is obvious that great economic changes are going on now in the country. We are to have undoubtedly an adjustment of the tariff. I should very much prefer a scientific and gradual adjustment of that tariff, but I very much fear that, in the contention of parties, it will not be so accomplished. I hope that the Democratic Party will not go too fast, but whether it goes too fast or not, it will be charged with going too fast and an attempt will be made to create alarm and apprehension throughout the country because of its action, either threatened or realized. There is such a thing as being scared to death when there is no physical reason for human dissolution.

In all these matters involving economic readjustment it is of the highest importance that we should have our system of exchange based upon principles that will permit a free movement of the medium of exchange; otherwise exchange is blocked, arrested, impeded, and production is embarrassed. Obviously, therefore, there is no time in which financial legislation is of such importance as now, and yet we are likely to attend to it last instead of first.

HIGH CUSTOMS DUTIES—SHALL WE JUMP OR SLIDE DOWN?

As to customs legislation, we are very much in the position of a man who has climbed to the top of a high steeple and who realizes that he can not remain there long, that it is dangerous for him to remain there, and he hesitates as to whether he should jump down or slide down. The question now before us is, the American people having made up their minds that this tariff shall be reduced, and materially reduced, whether Uncle Sam, having reached this high and perilous pinnacle, shall throw himself to the ground or shall gradually slide down. So far as I am concerned, I believe in the sliding process. We have made so little progress during the last 50 years in tariff reform that if we should take 25 years to accomplish that which we desire I would not regard the time as very lengthy. In the history of governments and of great economic movements it does not make much difference whether a thing is accomplished in 1 year or in 25 years as compared with the great eras of time through which governments live and in which economic principles operate. So I would rather slide down slowly to a correct standard than tumble down or throw our entire economic and industrial system into confusion.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Following the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada, is not the danger that if we fall down, instead of sliding down, the effect, coupled with the psychological effect that the Senator has referred to, will produce a reaction that will result again in the old tariff conditions, and really we shall get nowhere?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the danger.

Mr. CLAPP. And that I wish might sink into the mind of every Member of the Senate. If we go too fast, what the Senator has stated will be the result, whereas if we will take our time, go along gradually, and avoid the reaction that will come from a depressed condition of our business affairs, we should make some tangible and permanent headway.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, there is no question but that very radical action is likely to have the effect referred to by the Senator from Minnesota and result in such a revulsion of feeling upon the part of the people as to intrench the old advocates of the high protective system again in power; and so, without referring to any particular method of gradually sliding down to a reasonable standard, it seems to me that our efforts should be in that direction, and I have no doubt that in this Congress we can do it. I have no apprehension that the schedules coming over here to the Senate from the House of Representatives will be very radical in character. They may not be sufficient to satisfy the reform sentiment of the country; but, with reference to all of them, we can certainly provide for the gradual destruction of absolutely prohibitive duties—which serve no purpose except that of protection and accomplish nothing in the way of revenue—by providing in just a few lines that wherever, under any duty, the importations of a particular article do not equal one-tenth of the total consumption, a reduction of that duty shall be made at the rate of 5 per cent per annum until the importations have reached that level, and instruct the President to then report the matter to Congress for its further action. Thus, without inviting a flood of foreign importations, we can maintain the brake upon foreign importations and at the same time steadily reduce the tariff until it reaches the standard of revenue production.

DANGERS OF RADICAL REDUCTION.

We have, of course, to realize that to-day we get $300,000,000 per annum from our customs duties, and that this revenue is obtained from about $700,000,000 of dutiable imports, the duty being on the average of about 45 per cent. There is no man who favors revenue tariff reform who would regard an average duty of 30 per cent as reaching the point of reduction at which we should aim, and yet, if we were to frame a measure to-day that would yield an average duty of 30 per cent, which would be high protection, it would mean that all the existing duties would have to be reduced one-third on the average.

What would be the effect if the importations do not increase? A reduction of one-third in the duties would mean that, instead of getting $300,000,000 revenue, we would get $200,000,000 revenue, and we would have to make up that deficit by some other tax. But it is claimed that the importations would increase to such an extent as to yield us the $300,000,000. If that were so, then the importations must increase to the extent of nearly 50 per cent in order to yield that amount, and instead of having importations of dutiable articles to the extent of $700,000,000, we would have importations of dutiable articles to the extent of $1,000,000,000. What effect would it have upon the industries of the country if within a year the products of our domestic factories to the extent of $300,000,000 were supplanted by foreign products? It would mean, of course, an industrial disturbance in the country.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Has the Senator figured out the percentage of increase? It strikes me, from a somewhat hasty computation, that it is too much. I do not know whether or not the Senator has figured it out.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is very easily ascertained.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, I know that; but I did not know whether the Senator had figured it out.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Forty-five per cent of $700,000,000, the amount of present importations, would yield about $300,000,000. Thirty per cent on $1,000,000,000 of dutiable importations would produce $300,000,000, so that you see the existing importations will have to be increased pretty nearly 50 per cent in order to give us a revenue of $300,000,000.

Mr. CLAPP. That is correct.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, we have got to measure the effect upon the industries of the country, the disturbance in labor, and so forth. Can we take out of the production of this country within one year $300,000,000 in value without creating an industrial disturbance, strikes, and so forth, which may have the effect of driving the party which has made so immediate and instant a change out of power?

It is clear that if under a 30 per cent duty importations are maintained just as at present our revenue would be reduced from $300,000,000 to $200,000,000. On the other hand, it is just as clear that if we are to maintain our present revenue of $300,000,000 the importations would have to be increased from $700,000,000 to a billion dollars of dutiable articles. I have not the slightest doubt that the country could adjust itself to those conditions within a reasonable and moderate time, but to have them precipitated upon us within one year, particularly in times when our whole financial system is out of joint, when we have, as is admitted, the worst banking system in the world, no one can measure what the result might be.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I want to get the Senator's view a little clearer upon this proposition. Does the Senator believe that a reduction of one-third of the present tariff duty would necessarily mean the introduction into this country of one-third more of foreign-manufactured goods?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; not necessarily.

Mr. REED. The difficulty, I take it, therefore that the Senator is laboring with is not so much the question of disturbance of the industrial conditions of our own country, but with the problem of how we are to raise the revenue which we would lose if we reduce the tariff, and the foreign importations were not increased correspondingly?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not take it that the Senator means to say if we reduce the tariff to 30 per cent on the average that that would mean that there would be a billion dollars worth of foreign goods imported here, but that, on the contrary, it might mean a reduction of the extortionate profits of American manufacturers to the benefit of the consumers, but we would lose the revenue.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And that could be made up by some other means.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stated the effect in the alternative, as the Senator will recollect.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator, but I wanted to make it plain that that was his meaning.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stated the effect in the alternative. I said that one of two effects would be produced, either that there would be a large increase in importations, which would make our revenue just as it is—an increase in importations amounting to pretty nearly 50 per cent—or there would be a reduction in revenue of $100,000,000 annually, for which we must provide in some other way.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. In the latter alternative which the Senator states is he not proceeding on the theory that the present rate is the maximum revenue-producing rate—that is, that it is at the highest revenue point? Of course, if the Senator is to assume that a reduction of duties is to result in a reduction of revenue, his assumption must rest on the theory that the present rate is nearer the maximum revenue point than the new rate would be. You can reduce revenue by increasing the rate above the maximum revenue point or reducing the rate below it, and can increase revenue by approaching the maximum revenue line whether from above or below.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, but assuming that a large portion of these duties is prohibitory and the reduction in the duty is made——

Mr. SHIVELY. That is the other alternative.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then we are likely to have an increase of revenue from those duties only through an increase of importations.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The more nearly the existing tariff is prohibitory, unless it is so excessively prohibitory that it would still be prohibitory at 30 per cent, the more certainly there would be an increase of importations if duties were reduced to an average of 30 per cent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not quite catch the Senator's meaning.

Mr. CLAPP. The more nearly the present tariff is prohibitory, unless it is so prohibitory that the reduction to 30 per cent would still leave it prohibitory, the more certainly the reduction to 30 per cent would result in very marked increase of importations.

REDUCTIONS MUST BE GRADUAL.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. So we have got to confront one of two situations, it seems to me, by any great and material immediate reduction in the tariff, namely, either an increase in importations, which will disturb the industries of the country, or, on the other hand, a reduction of the revenue.

Now, then, I believe this thing can be accomplished without materially disturbing either our revenues or our importations, by gradual action, extending over a period of years. So far as I am concerned, I am not content with the reduction even to 30 per cent. I think the tariff duties of this country ought to be less than 30 per cent, and I would hope to achieve something very much less. The fact is that whilst I have been moderate in my views regarding the reduction of the tariff, I have been so appalled at the methods employed to maintain these customs duties; I have been so appalled at the results of the interference of these great industrial managers in the control of the Government, that I am growing less and less patient every day with the system of protection. I would be glad to see it abandoned altogether. I would hope ultimately to have a system of free trade. That is the goal which I would strive to reach. But I would not expect to accomplish it within 20 years or 30 years or perhaps 50. But I would put in the law itself such a principle of reduction as regardless of party mutations would certainly reduce these duties, and I would fix it in such a way as to require the joint action of the Senate and the House of Representatives and the President to destroy the working of that principle.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. Do I understand that the Senator regards it as necessary and wise to put up a system of brakes between the present average duty, which he says is about 45 per cent, and an average duty of 30 per cent?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would.

Mr. SHIVELY. I presume the Senator recalls a certain document laid before the Senate in the discussion of the act of 1909. The figures produced related to the census value of products embraced in the several schedules of the bill, and in parallel columns showed the total wages paid in producing the product to be 17 per cent of the total census value of the product. The alleged difference in the cost of labor has usually been urged as the necessity for, and basis of, a protective rate. Now, does the Senator contend that there is danger involved in reducing the duty on the average article in the schedules to 30 per cent?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should say that an immediate reduction of all the duties of the tariff to an average of 30 per cent would be attended by serious industrial disturbance.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to say that he would eventually be in favor of free trade?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I stated that I have become so out of patience with the manifestations relating to the political control exercised by the great interests, with a view to maintaining the protective system, that I am prepared to go gradually to free trade, but I would not expect to see that accomplished within the next 25 years, and, perhaps, not within the next 50 years.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator then raise revenue by direct taxation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. What is that?

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator then raise the revenue necessary for the Government by direct taxation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It would have to be raised by internal revenue, by income tax, and corporate taxes, and other taxes of that kind.

Mr. President, among the other measures to which I referred as demanding immediate action was one providing for the neutralization of the Philippine Islands. I shall not comment upon that. It is obvious that those islands constitute the great danger spot in our future. At any time there a conflagration involving international complications may be ignited that will involve the energies of the entire country in putting it out.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator just observed in his reply to the Senator from Idaho that we would have to raise revenues by some other method. When he speaks of free trade to which we might approach, does he mean the abolition of customhouses, or does he mean the readjustment of duties so that they would bear simply upon noncompeting products. That is sometimes popularly referred to as free trade. Of course the total abolition of the customhouses would be quite a different proposition. That would involve some other system of taxation by which to raise the revenue.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that I have not given very much thought as to what should be the sources of revenue in case either free trade were established or such a system of customs duties as the Senator points out should be established. I only say that as a matter of theory, not of practical judgment addressed to existing conditions, I am so out of patience with the protective system that I would gladly see it abandoned and gladly see as an alternative absolute free trade, even free trade with reference to products concerning which there is no competition in this country. I believe essentially in the principle that the taxation of the country should be levied upon the wealth of the country and not upon the consumption of the country, and I would welcome any gradual change that would bring that about, but I do not favor a sudden change, involving serious industrial readjustments.

CONSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION—RIVER REGULATION.

The fifth measure which I suggested should be taken up by our committees was one providing for the cooperation of the National Government with the States in devising and carrying out comprehensive plans for the regulation of river flow, with a view to the promotion of navigation and the prevention of destructive floods through the preservation of forests, the storage and use of flood waters for the irrigation of arid lands, and the storage of flood waters for the development of water power; and providing a fund ample for continuous work, to be conducted under the direction of a board of experts authorized by law.

Now, this is a matter upon which public opinion is made up. There is no question that we should have full development of our rivers for every use to which civilization can put them, and one of those uses is navigation and another use is irrigation and another use is its development as water power. There is no reason why these great rivers should not be developed by the cooperation of the sovereigns having control over these respective uses, the National Government having control of the navigation and the State governments having control over the other uses of the river.

Public opinion is made up upon this question. We should expend at least $50,000,000 annually from this time on in this matter just as we have expended about that amount on the Panama Canal. It is one of the great constructive works of the country, and with reference to the development of this work, it seems to me we should enter upon a material reduction of our military expenses and should save at least $30,000,000 annually in the matter of our Army and Navy establishments.

The sixth measure which I have suggested provides for the protection of our natural resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control.

The mind of the public is made up upon this question, and yet no substantial advance has been made in legislation.

The seventh one provides for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine by free entry to American registry of all ships, wherever constructed, and by the construction of auxiliary ships for our Navy, to be used in time of war in aid of the fighting ships and in time of peace in establishing new routes of commerce through lease to shipping companies; such legislation to involve the temporary diminution of the construction of fighting ships and the substitution of auxiliary ships, with a view to the creation of a well-proportioned and self-sustaining Navy.

It is not necessary to enlarge upon this. We all know that our Navy is incomplete. It is a badly proportioned Navy. It is a Navy composed of fighting ships which would be derelict upon the ocean without the auxiliary ships necessary to support them in case of war. One of the arguments used by our opponents with so much force for the creation of a merchant marine and the subsidizing of a merchant marine is that this merchant marine, when established, could furnish these ships. It seems to me instead of entering upon this perilous project of subsidizing private interests, it would be very much better for us to immediately determine to build a well-proportioned navy, instead of permitting it to continue a badly proportioned navy, and to provide for the use of the auxiliary ships in time of peace by leasing them out to commercial companies, so that they can be used in opening up these new routes of commerce to Africa and South America and Asia of which we hear so much.

Mr. President, it was not my intention when I rose to speak at such length, but interruptions have led me on from stage to stage. My purpose was only to call the attention of the Senate to a definite legislative program, involving nine questions upon which we shall act and seven questions upon which our committees can act, all of them questions upon which public opinion is made up.

CONTROL AND RESPONSIBILITY REST ON PROGRESSIVES IN SENATE.

Now, this recent vote has demonstrated what? It has absolutely demonstrated that the legislation of the Senate is in the hands of the reform and progressive element of the Senate. The responsibility rests upon us and not upon the so-called dominant party for a systematic adjustment of the business of the Senate, both in committee and in the sessions of the Senate, so that we can speedily accomplish these great matters of reform and constructive policy to which the progressive forces of the country have committed themselves. The vote yesterday shows what the progressive element of both parties can do. The responsibility for future action rests upon us. It has been shifted from the so-called Republican Party and now rests upon this union of forces composed of the Democratic Party, now nearly a majority of this body, and the progressive element of the Republican Party. The question is whether we shall make our action equal our responsibility.

I call the attention, therefore, of the Members of the Senate to these resolutions, and I suggest that they be seriously considered. Those of them which the Senate may not regard as of immediate importance may be eliminated, but by some decisive vote, such as given yesterday, we should express the firm determination of the Senate to proceed in order to the accomplishment of these great reforms.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to refer again to the question which was under discussion last evening, and intend to do so very briefly, indeed.

It was almost painful last night to behold the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] charging the Republican members of the Finance Committee of the Senate with entering into secret sessions, and the Senator from Ohio this morning asking the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] about a secret session held by the Republican members of the Finance Committee when the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration in 1909.

Mr. President, I have been looking up somewhat the history of the consideration of tariff bills, and, as I stated last night, the majority members of the Finance Committee in 1909 simply followed the precedent that has been pursued in the consideration of tariff bills by the Senate Finance Committee for years; and that statement was questioned. I want to read from a debate that took place in this body on the 21st day of February, 1894, when the Wilson-Gorman bill was under discussion. I want to call the Senators' attention to a colloquy between Mr. Chandler, known to all Senators as a Senator from New Hampshire, and Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, who was then chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate.

I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 21, 1894, the following:

Mr. CHANDLER. * * * I am asking the Senator from Indiana whether the acting member of that committee to-day and now is the Senator from Texas or the Senator from New Jersey, or whether both of those Senators are acting? Is not that a fair inquiry to make?

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have no disposition to give the Senator from New Hampshire a short answer, as he knows personally; but we are doing our business in our own way, which is none of his business. He is not a member of that committee, nor charged with any of the duties connected with it. We are hard at work transacting the business intrusted to our hands to the best of our ability. If the Senator is not satisfied with that answer, he may introduce a resolution of inquiry as to what we are doing, who is doing it, and how it is being done; and then we shall investigate it. That is all the answer I have to make to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg leave to say to the Senator from Indiana that it is my business to know what the committee is doing. * * *

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I am not to be betrayed into a loss of temper. I have nothing but feelings of personal kindness toward the Senator from New Hampshire, and I told him in tones of courtesy, I thought, that the RECORD showed who constitute the committee. * * * I ventured to say that we were doing our work in our own way, that it was our business and not the Senator's business, and that if he wanted a further answer, aside from what the RECORD shows as to who are on the committee, he could introduce a resolution and investigate. We can stand investigation right well, strange as that may seem.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah suspend for a moment? The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Continuing, I read what Mr. Sherman said:

Mr. SHERMAN. * * * It is said that, in pursuance of a custom which has sprung up within the last few years—or at least it has been said to me—the bill should be referred, in the first instance, to a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance favoring the bill as sent to us from the House of Representatives. I believe that rule or that custom is being pursued now by our Democratic friends. Certain it is that no member of the Committee on Finance who is classed as a Republican has been called into consultation with respect to the action upon the bill. I do not know but, upon the whole, that is probably the best way to consider the question.

* * * * * * *

Mr. VEST. * * * There has never been any subcommittee on the tariff upon the Democratic side of the Finance Committee, and such a statement has grown out of the active and prolific imagination which characterizes the modern newspaper reporter.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BUTLER. There are but six Democratic votes in the committee.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, there are only six Democratic votes in the committee, and there can be but six. It should not make any difference to our distinguished friends on the other side of the Chamber whether the work on the tariff bill be done by three or five or six of us. Without using the words of the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Voorhees, I submit in the kindest and most parliamentary sense that it can hardly be any of their business affecting the direct result in this case. The work that we have done has been done by those of us who are willing and able to do it, not under any appointment, but because we appreciate the great public necessity which requires that the bill shall be reported to the Senate as soon as possible.

* * * * * * *

There has been no star chamber about it. We have had no public hearings, because we deliberately resolved not to have them. We have listened, as far as we could, to the extent of human ability and endurance, to all who have come to us; and what a task it has been will be known only to those who have been afflicted in that regard. * * * This is a small matter, Mr. President. When we bring the bill before the Senate there will be time enough for the eloquence and logic which have been so unsparingly used here to-day. As to the modus operandi, so long as we do not violate the rules of the Senate or the laws or the Constitution, I respectfully submit that we ought to be permitted to do this work in our own fashion, submitting it, of course, afterwards to the full Finance Committee, and then reporting it to the Senate for their action upon it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. VOORHEES. * * * Now, so far as the question of a subcommitte is concerned, I think it matters nothing to Senators on either side of the Chamber whether the bill is considered by a subcommittee technically or by men who have been named as a subcommittee. The fact is that a majority of a committee which is charged with framing a bill must necessarily, before it is considered by the full committee, put their case in shape on paper. Every Senator on the other side of the Chamber knows what I say to be true. Every Senator there knows when they had the majority and brought forward the tariff measure of 1883, and notably of 1890—the McKinley bill—for weeks (I am tempted to say months, for it was a long time) none of the minority of the committee, then belonging to this side of the Chamber, was in consultation with them. We abided our time. We knew it was their right to make their bill to suit themselves before they submitted it to us or to the country.

* * * * * * *

Mr. VOORHEES. * * * I repeat, Mr. President, the only logical and reasonable and proper method of legislation on a subject of this kind is for the party in the majority, who are responsible for legislation, to put it in such shape as may be satisfactory to them, and then put it before the Senate and the country and take the consequences. Private discussion, prolonged and protracted debate between man and man, between 11 people—6 on one side predetermined, 5 on the other—is simply a ruthless consumption of time, while the interests of the country are demanding speed, rapidity of action. * * * Those who plead for delay, for long hearings, for technicalities, for Finance Committee discussions between man and man, will be known before the country as the advocates of delay in an hour when it is important to the business interests to know what is to happen to them.

Mr. President, this discussion took place upon the floor of the Senate when the Wilson-Gorman bill was reported from the House of Representatives, showing the course that the majority members of the Finance Committee, which was Democratic at that time, took in the forming of that bill.

I do not wish to take the time of the Senate longer to refer to other precedents, so will let this suffice, as it is the last tariff bill that the party on the other side of this Chamber had the responsibility of making.

Mr. President, I was in hopes that before we began the revision of any of the schedules of the tariff act of 1909 we would have a report from the Tariff Board to base the revision upon. Not having it, I think that it is unwise at this time to undertake to revise Schedule K or to consider the free-list bill. I am not opposed to a revision of the tariff if there can be produced reliable information, gathered by disinterested parties, showing that the present rates are too high. We have already a report from the Tariff Board upon print paper. I am willing to accept their findings, but we find that Members on the other side of this Chamber will not. I want to say that, as far as I am concerned, if the Tariff Board at any time submits information to the Senate through the President, and it is such information that can be readily verified, I am willing to act upon it in the revision of the tariff, if found necessary.

I know, Mr. President, if there is going to be a revision of the tariff schedules it ought to be made quickly. I have in my office to-day dozens of letters from clothing manufacturers from different parts of this country, asking whether there is going to be a revision of the tariff or not. The manufacturer of clothing hesitates to place his orders for cloth. The lightweight season is opening, the samples are being shown for next season's goods, and the clothing manufacturers are at a loss to know whether to buy or not. In turn, the retailer does not know whether to place his order with the clothing manufacturer. So the business is almost at a standstill. I insist that it is due the men interested in the great woolen industry and the thousands of workmen depending upon the operation of the mills for their daily bread to be given some consideration in this matter.

I do not want to put anything in the way of an early vote on the reciprocity bill. I am opposed to it. I think it is wrong in principle. It does not affect materially one product of my own State, but it does affect, in my judgment, the product of the farmer in the Northwestern States and the business interests of other parts of the country.

Mr. President, I believe in protection, and I believe that the reciprocity bill is not in conformity with the idea of protection and may be the beginning of the destruction of that great principle.

Mr. President, in relation to the early report of the Democratic woolen bill, made by the Senate Finance Committee this morning, I was in hopes that if it was to be reported time would be given the men from different parts of the country interested in that great industry to be heard. I know it is impossible to get many of the prominent men from the sheep ranches of our western country here in time to testify by July 10. Now is the time when they are exceedingly busy. Many have just finished shearing their sheep. They are moving them to the summer ranges; they are a long way from home and can not leave their flocks until the summer range is reached.

Again, I do not believe in a limited hearing, in the idea of having two men or three men to represent or testify for the varied interests involved and located in different sections of the country.

The idea of getting two or three men to come here to testify for all of the hundreds and thousands interested in the woolen industries in this country, when we know that the carded-woolen people and the worsted people are divided as to what the provisions of a tariff bill ought to be! We know that three-fourths of all the wool raisers do not belong to the National Woolgrowers' Association, and therefore that great body of men and the great body of independent manufacturers of woolen goods in this country, if the program had been followed out, would have been shut out from being heard by the Finance Committee. Rather than to have a partial hearing—an incomplete one—I thought it better that we should report the bill to the Senate and let every Senator judge for himself and get what information he could as to whether it is a proper measure or not.

Mr. BACON. May I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I did not interrupt the Senator while he was in the flow of his argument. These several interests had their full hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means, something over two years ago, did they not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I am asking not for argument but for the purpose to see if I am correct in my understanding. That is true, and all those hearings are printed?

Mr. SMOOT. They are all printed.

Mr. BACON. Now, the question that I was leading up to is this: Have conditions materially changed since then?

Mr. SMOOT. Let me answer the question in this way: Conditions have not materially changed, but the provisions of the bill from the House have materially changed. If the Senator from Georgia is willing to accept the evidence as conclusive that was given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives affecting Schedule K, I do not believe he would support this bill. It is a different proposition entirely. Hearings were had upon the question whether the rate of duty on wool should be 11 cents per pound, whether it should be on washed wool twice that amount, or whether it should be three times that amount upon scoured wool. That question is not before the Senate in this bill.

Mr. BACON. But, Mr. President, I understand that the questions we have to deal with in determining as to the proper rates to be imposed are questions largely dependent upon the cost of production; that is, from a protective standpoint. I do not view it from that point myself, but I am taking now the position the Senator occupies when he urges that there should be a hearing for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent the industry can be subjected to a lessened tariff, or rather relieved of a greater tariff and have a lesser one imposed. From a protective standpoint that question is largely influenced, if not controlled, by the question of the cost of production, the question of supply and demand, and so forth.

As I understand it, the conditions as to the cost of production and supply and demand have not materially changed since then, and if not, the information which is found in those hearings is simply to be applied to the new proposition to see whether under the evidence which is found there this new proposition can be successfully and logically maintained and supported. Am I not correct?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct; but——

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the result of the hearings gave to the woolgrower a rate of 11 cents a pound. The bill before the Senate proposed 20 per cent ad valorem, and the question as to whether 20 per cent ad valorem was sufficient protection to the woolgrowers of the West never was discussed or testified to in those hearings.

Mr. BACON. But, Mr. President, you do not want hearings for the purpose of getting the opinion of a man as to whether such and such a rate is sufficient protection from the protective standpoint, because when he gives you the fact you are the one to form an opinion. Aside from the fact that opinions are not testimony, it is particularly true that it should not be testimony to guide and control others when it is given by those who are particularly interested in personal and special interests, which would be the case with the woolgrower.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I told the Senator that at the hearings in the House it was concluded, taking the cost of production of wool into consideration, that 11 cents per pound was the proper rate of protection. The question was not considered by the sheep men of the country as to whether this proposed rate of 20 per cent ad valorem would ruin them or not.

Mr. BACON. We have the facts. They could only come forward and give us the same facts now that they did then. The only difference between the Senator and myself is this: I understand his contention to be that with the same information, with conditions as to those matters unchanged, we ought not to proceed upon the information already obtained, but we should get their opinion as to whether that is sufficient protection for them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I say if the Senator will look at the hearings, and I think I read them pretty carefully, he will find that the testimony given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House shows that it was necessary to have a rate of 11 cents a pound.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has exactly the same information that was acted upon then to argue that the same protection should be given. It is the same argument at last.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be different men from different parts of the country come and testify.

Mr. BACON. They would not give different facts though they might give different opinions.

Mr. SMOOT. They would, of course, give not only their opinion, but the facts might be different from those testified to two years ago. Besides, with new testimony we could judge as to whether the conditions of one section are the same as the conditions of another section and what would be an average expense in producing wool between different sections.

Mr. BACON. Unless the Senator is prepared to say that the conditions have so changed that the cost of production now is different from what it was two years ago, and the question of supply is different from what it was two years ago, and the question of demand is different from what it was two years ago, I do not see upon what ground the Senator can base the contention that a further hearing is needed, because those are the elements which furnish the consideration upon which we must base conclusions.

Mr. SMOOT. I think even upon those points there is justification for a hearing, owing to the fact that wool is less per pound now than it was then, that mutton is less per pound than it was then, and the price of sheep is less per head now than then.

Mr. BACON. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. And of course on the usual increase of sheep per annum the price being less, there would be a decrease of income to the flockmaster.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator require that men should come from the sheep ranches of the Northwest in order to give him that information? Does he not know those facts now? The Senator certainly knows that the price of wool, except so far as it may be influenced by transportation, is not different in one part of the country from another, and the price of sheep and mutton, of course, differs in some localities. The Senator knows what are the quotations of wool, of mutton, and of live sheep. He does not require more than three weeks in order to get that information. He can get it any day from any of the great centers. I presume there are Senators in this body who are thoroughly conversant with every detail of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I myself know about what is the price of wool, I know about what is the price of mutton, I know what is the price of sheep, but there are a good many Senators who do not know. The Senator says that the price of wool is the same in one section as another. Of course that is not the case.

Mr. BACON. With the difference in transportation, and all that.

Mr. SMOOT. We need not take transportation into consideration. The wool grown in Montana is worth, I suppose, on an average, 2 cents a pound more than the wool grown in Nevada.

Mr. BACON. That gives a man who buys and sells it that much margin for his profit.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all; it is because the wool is cleaner.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking about the same grades of wool, not different grades of wool.

Mr. President, the Senator is a business man. He knows the proposition to be true that if any article has any very great difference in value in one locality from what it has in another it is very speedily equalized by the fact that those who have the opportunity will take advantage of that opportunity to make a profit by taking it from one part of the country to the other and selling it, and that the demand for it speedily brings it to the same price. There is no material difference throughout this country in the price of articles of the same grade and quality, except what may be required for transportation and for the reasonable profit of men who are engaged in the interchange. I suppose the Senator as a business men recognizes that fact as an economic principle.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true as to principle.

Mr. BACON. Now, I do not think, if this were an original proposition and we had not been so recently through it, there would have been the ground for insistence upon prompt action that there is when within the past two years all this matter has been gone through, and here are the volumes which contain the hearings which were had before a Republican committee in the House upon possibly every question that we will have to deal with. Wherever conditions have changed, wherever prices have changed, that is a matter which can very easily be brought to the attention of the Senate, and brought in a way that nobody will dispute it. The Senator says he knows it but other Senators will not know it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that he can go through the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and he can not find where the actual cost in this country, as compared with the cost in any other country, has been given on any class of wool or woolen goods; and that is one question to be considered.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is not only a member of the Finance Committee, but he was a member of it when the former bill was enacted. Does the Senator mean to say that at that time, when we had that strenuous debate in this Chamber and these schedules were so vigorously attacked and so earnestly and stubbornly defended, the Finance Committee had not informed itself upon the important change in regard to which the Senator now says those hearings do not give any information?

Mr. SMOOT. I said that that information is not in the hearings had before the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. BACON. Where was it?

Mr. SMOOT. We had nothing to do with the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. BACON. But for action in the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senate committee did have the wage scale of foreign countries paid in woolen mills.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says the Senate committee had it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BACON. When?

Mr. SMOOT. When the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration.

Mr. BACON. Did the committee have it, or the part of the committee the Senator now belongs to?

Mr. SMOOT. Any Senator who wanted that information could send down to the Department of Commerce and Labor and get the wage scale of the different departments in a woolen mill, and they were quoted a number of times upon this floor.

Mr. BACON. Then there is nothing in the contention of the Senator that if there was such a defect in the former hearing it should be supplied by a hearing now, because if it could be obtained then from the Department of Commerce and Labor it can be obtained now.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is relying upon the hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and I simply said to the Senator that the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee of the House does not show the difference in any one class of woolen goods made in this country as compared with any other country.

Mr. BACON. But at the same time that fact does not support the contention of the Senator that further opportunity should be given for hearings, because the Senator presents to the Senate the fact that whereas in the House hearings there was that omission, when it came to the consideration by the Senate that omission was easily supplied by a simple application to the Department of Commerce and Labor, something which can be done now.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a question as to whether there are differences existing in different parts of the country and in different mills. That would have to be taken into consideration as well. I know of no report giving the difference in cost of the production of wool in this country and foreign countries.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to call his attention to some of the items in that bill which have been absolutely incomprehensible to me in the past, except from the standpoint of those who were more particularly interested in the profits to be derived from the sale of the articles which are included in it, but which may be answered by the fact now, if the Senator is correct in his representation that the committee did not have the necessary information. I want to read it to the Senate, and I would be glad to have the Senator state whether what I am about to read is due to the fact that the committee did not have sufficient information or whether it now maintains that its action was correct.

I want to read the information derived from that committee itself as to duties upon certain articles of common use in the wool schedule, to see whether or not these exorbitant rates are due to the fact that the committee thinks they are right, or due to the fact that the House committee had not furnished this information as to the difference in cost of foreign goods and domestic goods, and therefore the committee was misled. In the wool schedule, of course, there are specific duties and ad valorem duties, and when we read them simply as they are stated in the bill a correct appreciation of the ad valorem duty is not conveyed to us.

The Finance Committee, or a portion of it, two years ago, at the instance of some Senators, brought into the Senate a table prepared by their experts, which showed what were the ad valorem duties upon those articles, the law specifying in part ad valorem duties and in part specific duties. This table, a copy of which I still have, specifies in each case where the ad valorem duty and the specific duty were combined what the maximum ad valorem duty was. Without reading it in detail, I will merely state enough of it to give a suggestion of the character of the article.

I want to say to the Senator that it is, in my opinion, the existence of these very exorbitant duties which would in itself justify the Senate in insisting that there should be early action in the attempt to remedy what we think to be a great evil. For instance, I will now enumerate some of them. I will say that I wish now to read the items as they were in the bill as reported by the Finance Committee. I do not think these particular items were materially changed in the report of the conference committee, which afterwards was enacted into law by Congress. If I read any article in which there has been any material change, I know that the Senator from Utah is so very familiar with the subject that he can correct me.

Mr. SMOOT. There were very few changes.

Mr. BACON. There were very few changes, and I do not think there were any in this particular part of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. And perhaps none on those particular items.

Mr. BACON. I now read from paragraph 378 of the bill:

"On clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, wool hats, shawls, whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts not woven, and not specially provided for in this section," and so forth, the ad valorem duty, according to the testimony of the experts of the committee submitted in the table, was 95.98 per cent—nearly 96 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is on importations.

Mr. BACON. Yes; the customs duty. You might say, in round numbers, the duty is 96 per cent. It lacks only two one-hundredths of 1 per cent of being 96 per cent.

"On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description or character, composed wholly or in part of wool," the duty is 118 per cent ad valorem.

According to another paragraph, paragraph 376—I am reading this backward, because I am beginning at the lower and going on the ascending scale—"on women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, and goods of similar description and character," and so forth, the duty is 115.53 per cent ad valorem.

"On cloths, knit fabrics, and all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this section," and so forth, the duty is 141 per cent ad valorem.

"On yarns made wholly or in part of wool," and so forth, the duty is 143.02 per cent ad valorem.

And, to cap the climax of all, the thing which, if anything, ought to be cheap and which is necessary to the comfort of the people when they go to bed at night to protect themselves and their children from cold and disease, on blankets the duty is 165.42 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. President, I brought that in simply because of the statement of the Senator that on these particular articles, as well as on others, and on the particular class of goods he mentioned, there was no hearing on the part of the other House which would give information as to the difference of cost abroad and at home of those particular articles. I then propounded the inquiry whether or not these enormous and exorbitant rates on things of everyday use, necessary not only for comfort, but for health, were due to the fact that the Senate Finance Committee did not have the requisite information at the time, or whether in the opinion of the Senator those are now proper duties?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it would take a considerable length of time to go into this question in detail, but I want to say to the Senator that the fact that a certain grade of blankets protected by a 165 per cent ad valorem duty is being proclaimed throughout the country for the purpose of creating the impression among the people that all woolen blankets carry that high and excessive rate——

Mr. BACON. Very naturally.

Mr. SMOOT. But those who proclaim it do not stop to tell the people that the blanket that is imported carrying a duty of 165 per cent costs below 30 cents a pound, whereas fine scoured wool, without being touched by way of manufacture, was worth 60 cents a pound, so it can not be a straight all-wool blanket. If it was a woolen blanket—and Schedule K was made for woolen goods—the rate would not be 165 per cent. If the manufacturer in a foreign country mixes cotton, shoddy, mungo, and chopped-up rags from the discarded clothes of the people of the world with a little wool and calls it a woolen blanket and ships such blankets into this country as woolen blankets, I care not what the duty on them may be.

I will say to the Senator that the profit on the blankets that are made in this country of wool does not at any time exceed 10 per cent, and the woolen mills would be delighted to make them at a rate of 10 per cent profit. Senators talk about woolen cloth. Schedule K is formed on a scientific basis, as it was in the early sixties, and with a view that woolen goods would be made of wool. If we reduce the rates in Schedule K to provide an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent on a 30-cent-per-pound blanket, I tell Senators that every piece of woolen cloth, every woolen blanket, and every piece of woolen dress goods would come into this country on almost a free-trade basis, and no mill in this country could survive such a rate. It is for that reason that these large percentages of ad valorem duties can be pointed out. Take the importation of 30-cent-per-pound blankets, they amount to nothing.

Mr. BACON. Of course it amounts to nothing with a 165 per cent duty on them, which is prohibitory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the blanket which comes in here with not a pound of pure wool in it is sold to the American people for a woolen blanket. Take yarns at 40 cents a pound. Scoured wool was worth 60 cents a pound; and with all the work that is put upon it, it is possible that the Senator will say that yarns under 40 cents per pound is woolen yarn; yet the law is that if there is wool in it, or a component part of it is wool, it has to pay woolen rate. If you would take high-priced woolen yarns the ad valorem rate would be more than cut in two.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator speaks of blankets being made, I believe, at a profit of 10 per cent. I wish to say that that is not applicable to all woolen goods. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Schedule K was finally agreed to on June 11, 1909, upon the Payne-Aldrich bill. On June 15, 1909, four days later, the directors of the Whitman Mill declared a dividend of 33 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Made upon real estate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I exploded the thriftiness of that real estate transaction in a former session of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I have to say in answer is I know nothing of the facts other than by letter. I do not know whether the letter contained a falsehood or not, but I received that information by letter.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, has confused his facts. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] alleged that an extortionate dividend realized by one mill in Fall River, Mass.—I think the Troy mill—was due to a successful real-estate transaction. I allude to a subsequent occasion when the directors of the Whitman mill declared a dividend of 33 per cent after Schedule K was agreed to in the Senate and after the real-estate transaction referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts and after the real-estate dividend had been declared.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course all I know is from information I received by letter; but I want to ask the Senator does he know whether, if the case is as represented by him, it was not a cumulative dividend, one that the company had been earning and laying aside for many years?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think I quoted the figures at the time concerning the granting of those dividends, showing the capital stock and showing the surplus. One mill, I remember distinctly—a cotton mill, however—had accumulated a surplus exceeding its capital stock and had declared a dividend for nine years—an annual dividend—of 67 per cent.

I will say now that on the occasion when the 33 per cent dividend was declared, a half million additional stock was issued, I presume in order to moderate the appearance of high dividends in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who says that a profit of 10 per cent is not the case on other cloths, I will say I am positive that there is not a woolen mill in the United States that would not be perfectly willing to contract its entire output at a profit of 5 cents a yard, unless, perchance, it might be a mill or two that is making the finest sort of goods. I know the ordinary mill would be delighted to contract every yard of their production at a profit of 5 cents a yard.

It takes 3½ yards of cloth, on an average, to make a man a suit of clothes, thus giving a profit to the manufacturer of only 17½ cents on a suit of clothes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say awhile ago that there was a changed condition—that is, a change between the condition now and the condition which existed two years ago, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was passed—and to specify as to that change that there had been a reduction since then in the price of wool. Could the Senator tell us about how much?

Mr. SMOOT. I judge about 6 cents per pound.

Mr. REED. A pound?

Mr. SMOOT. A pound.

Mr. REED. But the Senator also said that there had been a reduction in the price of mutton. Could the Senator tell us about how much?

Mr. SMOOT. About 1⅞ cents.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator enlighten us whether the Payne-Aldrich bill raised the tariff on wool and woolen goods or lowered it?

Mr. SMOOT. It lowered it, Mr. President, on a few items.

Mr. REED. But, on the whole, raised it, did it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It did not raise it on a single item.

Mr. REED. How much did it lower it?

Mr. SMOOT. I said a very little on a few items.

Mr. REED. So that, notwithstanding the enormous protection of the Payne-Aldrich bill, it nevertheless remains true that the price of wool and of mutton have both decreased in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and if the Senator and others keep up this agitation much longer, and keep the business of the country unsettled, it will go still lower.

Mr. REED. Well, after you had settled it by the Payne-Aldrich bill, do you not think that that ought to have completely restored confidence to the country and sent your wool sky high? But I do not care to go into that; I want to get the facts.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the facts are that ever since the Payne-Aldrich bill passed there has been an agitation in this country for revision of Schedule K, and there has been a feeling that there was to be a change; and, of course, no manufacturer is going to buy wool upon an 11-cent duty basis when he expects there is to be a reduction in the duty. Does not the Senator know that a woolen manufacturer who buys a pound of wool to-day does not get his money out of it for over 12 months?

It has to be put through the process of manufacture, then sold to the clothing manufacturer sometimes four or five or six months before the day of delivery, and then is compelled to give four months' time on invoice dated ahead.

Mr. REED. I only desire to have the fact, from an expert upon the matter, appear in the RECORD that, notwithstanding the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill, which is supposed to confer untold benefits upon the wool and woolen industry, the price of both wool and woolen goods has decreased enormously, and I want to stick a pin here so that if the price should go further down in the course of the development and competition of this country, our friends will not say it is because the wicked Democrats lifted some of the burdens from the backs of the people.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Missouri could speak for the Democrats upon the other side of the Chamber, and to-day say that they would vote against the House wool bill and that it would not pass, the price of wool would increase immediately.

Mr. REED. For how long?

Mr. SMOOT. Until agitation was started again or a panic should interfere.

Mr. REED. It is evident then, Mr. President, if the Senator's statement is correct, that there would be more potentiality in my poor voice to raise the price of wool than there was in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I said if the Senator could speak for the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber—not his poor voice. I referred to the voice of the Democratic Party.

Mr. REED. Then there would be more potentiality in our promise than there was in Republican performance rendered through the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It all depends upon what the promise is. In this case it would preserve the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE. I wish to propound a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah yields the floor. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah whether wool is as low to-day, or whether wool has been as low since the Payne-Aldrich bill passed, as it was in September, 1908?

Mr. SMOOT. In 1908 there was a money panic, as the Senator from Oklahoma knows.

Mr. GORE. No; that was in October, 1907.

Mr. SMOOT. But the wool sold in 1908 was affected by the money market, and the panic extended into 1908.

Mr. GORE. Under what sort of Schedule K did that panic occur?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present schedule.

Mr. GORE. Was that due to agitation on the Democratic side of this Chamber?

Mr. SMOOT. No one ever claimed that it was. I said, in answer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that the price would decrease either through agitation or a money panic of some kind.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, one further question. I did not understand whether the Senator from Utah stated that woolen cloth and woolen goods had declined correspondingly with the decline in wool?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is rather a hard question for me to answer, because of the fact that I have not given special attention of late to the wholesale price of woolen goods in the way of comparing prices one year with those of another.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply want to say one word before the Senator from Utah leaves the subject, and that is that he has opened a new suggestion to me, which is that the real purpose of the high protective tariff on wool, with the duties, which I have read, ranging from 85 per cent up to 165 per cent, was to protect the American people against shoddy goods.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the debates on every tariff bill since 1883, or since the inauguration and adoption of the present system of tariff legislation of the wool schedule, he will find the theory of Schedule K is as I have stated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I probably did not express myself properly, or probably the meaning intended was not fully appreciated by the Senator in the manner in which it was expressed. I quite grant the proposition that the duties in many of the items which I have read are for the purpose of protecting the manufacturers of shoddy goods in this country. I grant that; but I understood the Senator in his remarks to-day to intend to suggest the proposition that the purpose was to protect the people themselves from the wearing of inferior goods, and not for the purpose of protecting the manufacturers of similar goods.

Mr. SMOOT. I referred to the fact that articles come into this country as woolen goods and considering the price for which they are sold the people ought to be protected and ought to know that they are not woolen goods. For instance, let me again call the Senator's attention to the price of blankets. He refers to blankets, as a good many others have done of late, and the 165 per cent duty on them; that is, the duty on blankets valued at not to exceed 30 cents a pound. Some of the imported blankets are valued at less than 30 cents a pound and none mentioned by the Senator exceed 30 cents a pound. Remember that. At that time fine wool was worth 60 cents a pound clean; let us say, it costs 90 cents a pound to produce a straight wool blanket. The duty on that class of blankets would be one-third of the duty on blankets valued at less than 30 cents a pound, or 55 per cent ad valorem, instead of 165 per cent.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, but when you reduce it to an ad valorem basis, it does not in any manner relate to the question of a specific duty——

Mr. SMOOT. No; not at all.

Mr. BACON. Because the ad valorem that is stated here is the equivalent of both the specific and the ad valorem.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I know the Senator knows it; I am quite sure of that.

Mr. SMOOT. But I was telling the Senator that if you take an imported woolen blanket valued at 90 cents a pound, instead of the rate on woolen blankets being 165 per cent, it would be 55 per cent.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, here is a report brought to us by the Finance Committee itself, stating the fact that upon blankets, adding together the equivalent of the specific duty and the additional ad valorem duty, the ad valorem equivalent is 165 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is true; but it is upon blankets the value of which is under 30 cents per pound.

Mr. BACON. I have not got the table before me now, because I gave it to one of the reporters; but, Mr. President, 165 per cent is of course the maximum. There are some classes of blankets on which the rate is not so great; but on all of them there are most exorbitant rates of duty.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator, is it not true that if the value of the blankets imported into this country had been 90 cents per pound, instead of 30 cents, the ad valorem duty would have been 55 per cent, instead of 165 per cent?

Mr. BACON. The Senator means to say that the different classes of blankets that are put in different tables——

Mr. SMOOT. They are all in the tables as to valuation.

Mr. BACON. Exactly; but they are not all dutiable at 165 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is what I say. I was simply saying that if there is imported into this country a woolen blanket valued at 90 cents a pound, which is three times the value of a blanket at 30 cents a pound, under the same duty the ad valorem equivalent instead of being 165 per cent would be one-third of that, or 55 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a question. From his statement it appears that there is a duty of 55 per cent ad valorem, when it is reduced to an ad valorem basis, upon the higher quality of all wool and the higher priced blankets, and that there is a duty of 165 per cent upon shoddy blankets. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. Such blankets as have a little wool in them, but I want to say that the 165 per cent——

Mr. WILLIAMS. When I use the word "shoddy," I mean a thing that makes a pretense of being wool when it is not. Is that true or substantially true?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; but in connection with that, I want to say to the Senator that I suppose the only blankets that are shipped into this country at that price and which carry that rate are brought in more than likely as samples, and are not sold to the people to any extent and should not be. Look at the amount of importations and you will see that is the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, Mr. President, and I understand that 165 per cent is very apt to be prohibitive, but that is not the point that I am raising. The point that I am raising is that, according to the Senator's statement, all-wool blankets are protected at a rate of about 55 per cent, according to his calculation, and that shoddy blankets are protected at a rate of 165 per cent. Now, I want to ask the Senator, as a Republican leader, with a very potent voice in connection with tariff legislation, upon what basis of justice, right concept, Republican tradition, or anything else, he defends the policy of protecting the manufacturers of shoddy blankets in the United States by a duty of 165 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the cheaper class of blankets were imported as cotton blankets, and a cotton blanket is 100 times better than the mungo or cotton waste——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. They would not carry this high rate, but they are imported as and sold for wool blankets.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. They are labeled "wool blankets," and they are intended to deceive the people and to be sold to the people as wool blankets, but they are not such.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that. Now, Mr. President, one question more: Do the imported shoddy blankets, made out of cotton with a wool pretense, an outward and visible sign of wool without any inward substance, come in competition in America with anything except the same sort of blankets manufactured in America; and is not the object and result and effect of the duty to protect by 165 per cent American fraudulent institutions which are also manufacturing exactly the same sort of blankets? In other words, would not the blanket that would come in as a cotton blanket, frankly making no pretense, come in competition with a blanket in America manufactured as a cotton blanket and making no pretense; and a shoddy blanket from abroad meet in competition in America the shoddy blanket made in America? And there stands a duty of 165 per cent to encourage the American manufacturer of shoddy blankets to go on in his business.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator understood the woolen business and the manufacturing of woolen goods he would know that many manufacturers who make low-grade blankets, especially in the same mill where higher grade goods are made as well, the waste of the mill is made into blankets; and the competition in American mills upon this grade of blankets is so sharp that there is no profit upon them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not the question I asked.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that is the result.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know about that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the result.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And while I am not very fond of hearings, it would require a great many hearings to convince me that that is the result. But what I am asking the Senator is this: To attempt, if he can, to defend the Republican policy of protecting American manufacturers of shoddy blankets by a duty of 165 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the theory of the bill at all. The theory of the bill is to protect woolen goods, because it is a woolen schedule and not a shoddy schedule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But did not you say a moment ago that it applied to blankets which came in with the fur on them and with the felt?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in those words, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and in that case it amounted to 165 per cent, and do not you admit that that sort of blanket competes with its own sort in the American market, and therefore the protection is a protection of shoddy blankets, whether that was the intent or not; and are you not willing to join us in removing that duty which protects every shoddy blanket, thus helping to deceive the American people by selling to them shoddy instead of wool?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi, as I said to the Senator from Georgia, that if the rate in Schedule K was only sufficient to protect shoddy blankets, called wool, the American manufacture of woolen goods would be upon a shoddy basis, and I, as an American, would prefer to see all wool goods made by American workmen rather than to reduce the rate to a shoddy basis and have shoddy goods only produced by American labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then why has the Senator so cunningly devised a tariff schedule as to protect all-woolen blankets by only 55 per cent while he protects shoddy blankets by 165 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had stated that over and over again, and I do not know that I can give the Senator any more enlightenment than I have.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think you can either——

Mr. SMOOT. I am glad to have the Senator so admit to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). But I merely wanted to disclose the fact that you could not.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I believe I can answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi perhaps better than the Senator from Utah saw fit to answer——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope so.

Mr. GORE. With reference to the Senator's disposition to reduce the extortionate duty on cheap blankets.

According to the statistics of the Treasury Department submitted to us two years ago the duty on the most expensive character of blankets was 70 per cent. The duty on the cheapest kind of blankets was 165 per cent, I believe. I submitted a motion in the Senate to reduce the duty on cheap blankets from 165 per cent to 70 per cent, so that costly blankets and cheap blankets would pay exactly the same duty, so that the blankets purchased by the rich and by the poor should pay exactly the same duty. That motion was voted down in the Senate almost by a strictly party vote. The Senator from Utah voted against that motion. That answers as to their disposition to discriminate between the two characters of blankets.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had sent to the desk and printed in the RECORD an editorial from one of the leading papers in my State in reference to a certain amendment introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] with respect to the election of the Senators by the direct vote of the people. That editorial being printed in the RECORD might lead to a misapprehension as to the sentiment of the people in my State in reference to the action taken by a Senator representing that State on this floor. Therefore, though I do not pretend to indorse either editorial, I ask the privilege of having printed in the RECORD an editorial from the other leading paper in order to counteract any misapprehension as to the sentiment of the people of my State in reference thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TALL MEN NEEDED.

[Editorial article in The State, Columbia, S. C., June 21, 1911.]

When WILLIAM E. BORAH, insurgent Republican from Idaho, speaking in the Senate in the latter days of the Sixty-first Congress, tore the sham of Republican love for the negro from that pathetic political figure, asserted the existence of universal race antagonism in this country, charged flagrant hypocrisy on the part of Republicans for assuming for political purposes such friendship, and declared in effect that the negro issue was dead, there was applause in the South for the boldness and frankness of the speaker, and the whole country appeared to accept his portrayal of conditions as a true description. There was recognition throughout the country that the intelligence and sanity of the country had, after playing it more than 40 years, advanced beyond that phase of the political game.

When northern Republicans holding high office voluntarily concede political equality and political independence of the Southern States, and hold the small minority of South haters impotent to draw sectional lines for the punishment or humiliation of Southern States for dealing with their problems in their own way, it would be only compatible with the dignity and self-respect of representatives of the South to regard as settled that which is thus conceded, and to refuse to entertain the idea of this marvelously developing section being ever again regarded by other parts of the country as a subject province.

It is time for men from the South to stand in the National Congress not merely in the attitude of local representatives, but as American statesmen and lawmakers. It is past the day for southerners to huddle together like sheep at a note of alarm sounded by a timid Member, and to imagine that tricks of legislation can be used to oppress or are needed to defend this section. It is time for the South to be exhibiting tall men in Congress, men with faith in themselves and in their whole broad country, men whose view is not confined to their State or section and who are not frightened by such scarecrows as the Bristow amendment.

To be great there must be self-reliance and infinite faith in inherent strength. A United States Senator publicly opposed compulsory education in South Carolina on the ground that if educated the negroes would occupy fields of endeavor now monopolized by whites, and the whites would suffer. When there is such lack of faith in the inherent superiority of the whites as is expressed in such an argument, how far toward power and independence will such leadership carry the whites? Given equal opportunity, the white man fearing negro competition in life's race is not worthy to triumph. To be worthy he must have faith in himself, and for the South to be worthy of power and independence it must have faith in itself and the justness of its position.

Instead of cringing before the menace of a political switch such as the Bristow amendment, the South's Senators should spurn the suggestion of the rights of their States being invaded, just as New England Senators would scoff the idea of political oppression by a combination against their section of the South and the West.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. BACON. What is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment commonly known as the Root amendment—the Root amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is not my intention at this time to discuss the general features of the bill before us.

At a later day I shall ask the Senate to hear from me in regard to the amendments which I have proposed to the bill. I can not, however, permit a vote to be taken upon the amendment presented by the committee and which bears the name of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] without giving as briefly as I can the reasons which will control my vote upon that amendment.

I shall vote against it, but I shall not vote against it because it is either in harmony or out of harmony with the agreement which is said to have been made between the Executive Department of the United States and certain representatives of the Dominion of Canada. I shall vote against it because I am in favor of free wood pulp and of free print paper. I am in favor of the free admission to the markets of the United States of these articles, because I believe that the manufacturers of paper in the United States have by a long-continued and successful effort practically eliminated competition from this enterprise in America.

I believe it to be true that the prices at which print paper is sold in the United States are not determined by the ordinary rules and forces of trade and commerce. I believe that these manufacturers have so restricted their own operations, have so manipulated the business in which they are engaged, that they fix for the publishers of the United States just such price as they desire to demand for what they produce. I believe that every American competitive industry is entitled to a protective duty which will in substance measure the difference between the cost of producing at home and elsewhere, with this one exception, which I am about to name.

I more than once said, and I repeat now, that according to my political philosophy, according to my economic views of the welfare of the people of the United States, the consumer of any article or commodity has a better right to competition in the production and the sale of that commodity than the producer has to protection in that commodity; and, in so far as I am able to do it, when I can separate any such article from the mass which may be contained in any schedule, I never intend to vote for any protection upon any article in which, or concerning which, competition has been by unlawful agreement, conspiracy, or practice destroyed in our own country.

I am a believer, notwithstanding some modern doctrines in that respect, in competition. I believe it is the only force which can be depended upon in industrial life to safely and fairly and justly determine prices. I believe it is the chief factor in a reasonable and fair and just distribution of the wealth which is from time to time produced by the labor of man.

I think it is the highest duty of the Congress of the United States to fashion and mold every enactment with the purpose to preserve in the business affairs of this country that effective and substantial competition which will protect not only those who are engaged in the business, but those who must buy the products that are the result of the business.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I cordially agree with the Senator in thinking that competition is still the life of trade, and most desirable, but unless I misunderstand this matter, the Paper Trust, if it be a trust, would be substantially in the same position when the tariff is taken off of wood pulp and print paper as it is to-day with the tariff on both. In other words, unless I am mistaken, the repeal of the duty on their raw material will fully compensate the paper manufacturers for the repeal of the duty on their finished article.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly the point to which my friend the Senator from Texas refers, and I agree entirely with the view which he expressed upon that subject a few days ago. I, however, am powerless to change this situation in that regard. All that I can do at the present time is to see to it, in so far as my vote is concerned, that print paper shall come from Canada free of duty or paper of the value of 4 cents per pound or less. If I had my way there would be no such limitation in the bill. I see no reason for admitting free paper that costs 4 cents a pound or less that does not equally apply to paper that costs more than 4 cents per pound, but I can not rewrite this measure. I can not inject into it my own opinions with regard to the proper adjustment, and I am limited to the mere recording of a vote at the present time upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

I do not claim that the tariff is now or will be in the future the chief instrument for the destruction of those combinations which have fastened themselves upon the American people, and which have destroyed in many of the great fields of enterprise the competitive forces upon which the world has heretofore depended for its safety. It is, however, one of the instruments which we can employ to make it more difficult for the American manufacturer to combine with his fellows in order to extinguish the competition, which will, if permitted its free and its full effect, fairly regulate prices in our country and protect the consumer of all articles against the unchecked avarice and greed of men who take all they can and keep all they take.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask a question for information. What difficulty will there be upon the part of the trust to extend its operations across the line?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not say that the free admission of this or any other article will effectually and permanently prevent the organization of trusts. It is possible for the manufacturers of the United States to combine with the manufacturers of Canada and then exact whatever prices they may see fit to demand. My only answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Idaho is that it will be more difficult for the manufacturers of paper in the United States to embrace in their combination all the manufacturers of the continent than it has been to take in the manufacturers of our own country.

I have no sympathy with the modern doctrine which is disseminated so carefully not only by the selfish but the altruistic; I do not believe in the propaganda that comes at the same time from the lover of humanity and the captain of industry, namely, that we must permit the business of the United States to combine, to monopolize, and then attempt to protect the people by a Federal commission which shall fix the price of the things they make and sell.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I do not believe that at this day and in our age the Government of the United States should undertake to fix the price of everything in which the American people deal, and when it does undertake that function it will have absorbed so much of the energy of the Nation that it may well take the next step, and it will very speedily take the next step, of excluding entirely the individual interest in our industrial life.

I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will be glad to join at any time with the learned Senator from Iowa in legislation dealing with trusts when they are declared to be trusts, but I think the Senator will agree with me that it has never been determined that there is such a thing as a paper trust in the United States. It has been charged——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think some of the officials have been indicted, but it has not yet been determined that it is a trust in restraint of trade. But, however that may be—and I think I am correct—the Senator is aware, of course, that there are a great many independent manufacturers of paper in the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. And if this so-called trust, which has not yet been legally determined to be a trust, is to be punished by opening our markets to Canadian paper, I suppose all these independent manufacturers will likewise be punished.

Then, again, I should like to ask the Senator this question—we will take the International Paper Co. as an illustration: Would he be in favor of dissolving that corporation and reestablishing 25 or 30 small paper concerns over the country; and, if that could be done, does he think it would reduce the price of paper?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not base my belief with regard to the character of the Paper Trust upon any judicial proceeding. That belief arises from a somewhat careful examination of the evidence that has been laid before the Finance Committee, and a somewhat studious investigation with respect to the general operations of this company in the United States, and some experience with the paper mills of the United States. I had, while governor of the State of Iowa, the duty put upon me of buying from the paper mills of this country the supplies for the State of which I was governor, and I became somewhat familiar with the general subject.

With regard to the following question, I understand perfectly that some hardship might follow the rule which I advocate. I know that there are some alleged independent manufacturers.

They are independent in the sense that they are not financially combined with, or absorbed into, the Paper Trust, but I believe it to be true that the Paper Trust substantially dominates the business and determines the prices, and fixes the conditions upon which paper shall be sold, and to whom paper shall be sold, and by whom paper shall be sold to particular purchasers; and if I must impose a hardship upon the independent, or so-called independent, manufacturers in order to relieve the people of the burden of these greater evils I choose to destroy the trust rather than to preserve the independent manufacturers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, one other question, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. REED. We can not hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa one other question, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I am correct in saying that the International Paper Co., which is the company always haled into court—at least the court of public opinion—manufactures print paper exclusively. The independent companies, so called, make different grades of paper, and there are I do not know how many hundreds of different kinds of paper made in this country.

Now, while the destruction of this so-called trust may be a good thing in the broad sense—I have never been persuaded that it is a trust, but we will admit that for the sake of the argument—our anxiety is always expressed in behalf of the ultimate consumer. I will ask the Senator, in all seriousness, if print paper from Canada is admitted free of duty and while it will, it is alleged, put $6,000,000 into the pockets of the publishers of newspapers in this country—one is to receive $550,000 out of it—will it help, to an infinitesimal amount, a single man who buys his 1-cent paper or his 10-cent magazine?

Will it not put that money absolutely into the coffers of the rich men who are now making enormous profits out of the publication of large newspapers? One gentleman, who gave testimony that his concern was a small newspaper compared to many others, said that his profits are $200,000; and yet he wants free print paper to make larger profit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not inquiring into the financial operations or the financial successes of newspaper publishers. I have looked upon the newspaper publisher as a consumer of this particular commodity. I take it for granted, however, that in the general attrition of affairs, if we had the competition in this country that we ought to have, if the newspaper publisher can buy his paper for $500,000 per year less than he now pays, somehow and somewhere the people who deal with that newspaper publisher will receive the benefit, or a part of the benefit, of the reduction in price.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am simply endeavoring to plant myself upon the competitive idea in the business of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not interrupt the Senator further. It has troubled some of us to discover a way whereby the ultimate consumer, the man who buys the newspaper or who advertises, is going to derive any benefit whatever out of this. One gentleman before the committee did say that he thought they might make the newspapers a little larger than they are. I would pray heaven that they would make them smaller, rather than larger, if I had my way. I think they are big enough now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not intending to quarrel with the Senator from New Hampshire upon that point. I am not here as the defender or apologist of the newspapers. Formerly they treated me with some kindness, but anyone who has seen the issues of the newspapers for the last few months will understand my unselfishness in what I am now saying.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming that there is a Paper Trust and that it is in control in a large measure of the American market with reference to the production and sale of paper, but assuming also that there are some independent paper companies, would it not be better to pass the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] instead of passing this reciprocity bill in order to get rid of the trust?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not for the reciprocity bill, and therefore I can not speak for those who do favor it in its present form. With respect to the proposal of the Senator from Ohio, I am entirely favorable to his suggestion, for I believe that the man who violates the law ought to suffer the consequences of his violation of it.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator, though, would favor a limitation upon attorneys' fees in case the prosecution was begun.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am convinced upon that point that it will be vastly more economical for the Government to increase the force of its regular employees and abandon the practice of employing special counsel.

Mr. President, I do not want it to be understood from anything I have said that I do not believe in the modern development of business. I understand perfectly that business must be carried on in a big way in these days, in a way so big and comprehensive that it can employ all the economies which are known to modern times. But there is no field of enterprise so small that it is not sufficient to hold more than one concern; I care not whether it is the business of selling peanuts or the business of manufacturing steel rails; the field is large enough to absorb and employ all the energies of mankind and all the capital that can contribute to economy and still preserve competition in its most effective form.

This is not material to the present discussion, of course. I have thought it necessary to digress a moment in order that it might be understood fully why I propose to vote against this amendment. I did not want it to be thought by any Senator that I was voting against it because I believe it to be either with or against the original agreement for reciprocity with Canada. I do not recognize any original agreement. I entirely dissent from the view that the President of the United States had any power to make any proposition to Canada or receive any proposition from Canada looking to a change in the tariff laws of the United States. I shall discuss that phase of the matter at some later time.

I do not criticize our Chief Executive because he entered upon the investigation of our tariff or commercial relations with Canada. I applaud him for his industry in that respect. But if we are to observe the Constitution of our country, if we are to preserve those relations which ought to exist between the coordinate branches of the Government, our Executive must pause and stop short of creating any condition out of which any obligation arises, moral or legal, for the change of our tariff laws. That power is in Congress alone. It is not only in Congress alone, but any proposition looking to a modification of our revenue laws must originate in the House of Representatives. If the President has the power to do what he has done, then as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said, and so well said, the other day, our relations with Canada could be changed by the mere assent of two-thirds of the Senate without any reference whatsoever to the House of Representatives.

This bill must be considered as though it had originated in truth and in fact in the House of Representatives. It must not be treated as having been originated anywhere else in any other department of the Government. I would not care to say so much as this were it not that I intend to insist later on upon that freedom of consideration, that liberty of amendment, and not only the legal right of amendment but the moral right and duty of amendment, which ought to be felt by every Senator in this body.

I would not say one word with regard to the contention of my distinguished friend from New York, with regard to the harmony of this amendment with the arrangement made between the Secretary of State of the United States and the two representatives of the Dominion of Canada, were it not that I can not stand silently by and see a doctrine of that sort become the prevalent impression throughout the country.

The senior Senator from New York says the President has stated in a speech delivered somewhere, I think in Chicago, that his amendment—that is, the amendment proposed by the committee, is according to the original arrangement. I do not think it is. I submit to the Senate that it is not only not in harmony with the original arrangement, but it is in direct and positive opposition to the original arrangement. The truth is that the bill as introduced in the House of Representatives is not an accurate statement of the arrangement made between the State Department of our country and the ministers of Canada. Why? Because the bill as originally introduced in the House of Representatives and as passed by the House of Representatives omits the condition upon which paper is to be admitted free into Canada. I agree to the criticism of the bill made in that respect. The proposed amendment, however, attaches a new condition upon the admission of certain paper and pulp and wood into the United States, and therefore we have a bill here which, if unamended, does not conform to the original arrangement and which, if amend as proposed by the Senator from New York, overthrows the entire spirit and purpose of the original arrangement so far as wood pulp and paper are concerned.

I can prove that, I think, so plainly and so effectually that there can be no longer doubt about it. It will be remembered that Schedule A, which is found in the message of the President transmitted to the Houses of Congress January 26, 1911, was attached to the letter signed by Mr. Fielding and Mr. Patterson to the Secretary of State, and that letter, together with these schedules, constitute whatever proposition was made by these representatives of Canada to our State Department; and the letter of Mr. Knox accepting these propositions, in so far as he could, constitutes the only acceptance of the proposal. I now turn to Schedule A and ask those Senators who are here to follow me a moment.

Wood pulp, paper, and wood are on the free list, a free list which, according to the title, is to be reciprocal, but the title of the list is of course modified by the conditions which are found in the body of the paper. It first declares on this subject:

Pulp of wood—

And so on—valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper.

If the agreement or arrangement had ended there, then there would have been an understanding that wood and pulp and paper of the sort described here would be admitted free into the United States and free into Canada. The first condition, however, provides the circumstances under which it shall be admitted free into the United States; that is, it limits the effects of the paragraph to which I have just referred, and that is that this paper and board, and so forth, shall not come into the United States free if it comes burdened with any export duty or restriction or limitation whatsoever upon its export from Canada into the United States. That fixes, according to the agreement, the circumstances under which these articles shall come into the United States free. The substance of this provision is that if the wood from which the paper is made, or the pulp from which the paper is made, or the board from which the paper is made comes from a quarter in Canada which imposes any such duty, fee, or restriction, then it can not come into the United States under this arrangement, but must pay the general duty prescribed by our general tariff law. But if these things come from lands which are not subject to the provincial duties or restrictions or limitations, then such pulp and such board and such paper enter our markets without any duty whatsoever.

The next provision determines the circumstances under which our wood and pulp and paper shall enter Canada free, and it provides:

That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

That is to say, Canada will not admit our wood or pulp or paper until we admit all the paper, all the pulp that may come from any part of Canada free.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment. That simply means, Mr. President, that for the time being we shall admit these articles free if they come from lands that are not subject to these limitations, but that Canada shall not admit our like products free until we give to Canada free paper and pulp from all her Dominion. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully agree with the Senator from Iowa in all of his propositions, with the exception of the latter.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the vital proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. The latter I could agree to if the second proviso was not to be considered in connection with the paragraph, but the words are used in the last proviso. It does not say "provided," but it says "provided also," meaning that it was to be interpreted as a part of the paragraph, and so sure am I that that is the intention of the agreement or the parties to the agreement had that idea that I took particular pains to find out what was said upon the part of Mr. Fielding in the Parliament of Canada. I have with me here a copy of his remarks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have read them.

Mr. SMOOT. His remarks plainly state that this applied to the paper and pulp of Canada only when the restrictions from every district or, in other words, from all parts of Canada were removed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have read what purported to be a part of the speech made by one of these ministers in the Parliament of Canada, and I think it was Mr. Fielding; and my recollection of the purport of what he said does not at all agree with the recollection of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Fielding on the 26th day of January introduced into the Canadian Parliament a bill, a copy of which I hold in my hand, but I presume the Senator has seen it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have it here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to know, because I want to be set right on this question, how the Senator gets rid of the words which I will read:

Provided, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is in exact accordance with the arrangement. In fact, it is an exact copy of the arrangement.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is practically the same thing as the so-called Root amendment, as I read it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. That is just where there seems to be so great a mistake. The proposition which the Senator from New Hampshire has just read fixes the circumstances or conditions under which these articles shall pass from the United States into Canada. The amendment that is proposed by the committee fixes the circumstances and conditions under which the wood pulp and paper shall be admitted into the United States, and therein lies a very great difference between the two.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not see why this does not operate both ways——

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all; it was——

Mr. GALLINGER. Because it says that our products shall be admitted free into Canada when the products of Canada are admitted free of duty into the United States from all parts of Canada.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Canada did not intend that any of our products of the character under discussion should be admitted into the Dominion until the like products from all parts of Canada came into the United States free. The United States intended, however, that these products from lands which are not burdened with these limitations or restrictions should come in at once free of duty, waiting for future developments to see whether we would ever get into Canada free.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am seeking light now; and I should like to ask the Senator where he finds that provision in the agreement or in any statement of the agreement?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have read it already. I will read it again, in order to be sure of it. We first have a schedule——

Mr. GALLINGER. I want the Senator to read the proviso also in connection with it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will read just as fast as I can. Schedule A is entitled—

Articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States to be admitted into Canada free of duty when imported from the United States, and, reciprocally, articles the growth, product, or manufacture of Canada to be admitted into the United States free of duty when imported from Canada.

If there were nothing more, every article mentioned in the list would be admitted into the United States free of duty and would be admitted into Canada free of duty. It requires some sort of modification in order to change that result. Let us see now what it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is genuine reciprocity, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not call it reciprocity.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not quite reciprocity. It would be exchange.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not reciprocity in any sense of the word.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it is not.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is simply free trade in those articles. In the sense in which free trade is reciprocity, this, of course, would be reciprocity, but not in the sense in which we have used that term heretofore, and especially in the sense in which we have used it as a political doctrine or to describe a political doctrine.

Now, I read—

Provided, That such paper and board, valued at 4 cents per pound or less, and wood pulp, being the products of Canada—

Being the products of Canada—

when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee, or otherwise) or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Now, we have limited the admission into the United States to certain conditions:

Provided also, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada—

Mark you now, the former provision referred to admissions into the United States. This provision refers to admissions into Canada—shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

If the Member of the House of Representatives who brought the bill forward there had wanted to make the bill an exact counterpart of the arrangement between these two departments, there would have been in the bill, in addition to the words now in it, the provision that when wood pulp, paper, and so forth, came into the United States from all parts of Canada free then the manufacturers of the United States should have the right to export into Canada free, and that the Parliament must pass a law of that character before this bill goes into effect.

So when Mr. Fielding introduced his bill into the Canadian Parliament he made exactly that provision, and proposed just such a law as the bill in the House of Representatives ought to have prescribed in order that if the law were not passed and we were not made sure thereby of free admission into Canada when these articles came free from all parts of Canada into the United States the agreement itself would never become effective. Why that was omitted from the bill introduced in the House I do not know, but I dissent entirely from the proposition that the amendment here proposed brings the bill into accordance with the arrangement made between the two countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it strikes me that the first provision the Senator has read, where it is provided that products of Canada shall not come from Provinces that impose an export duty, means that Mr. Fielding entertained the view that that inhibition would be removed, and that he was willing to go into this bargain with the United States upon the assumption that they would get sufficient benefits for the provincial parliaments to remove that inhibition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether Mr. Fielding thought these restrictions would be removed or not. It seems to me that he and his associates dealt very gingerly with that particular phase of this negotiation. You will remember that in their letter they say, in substance, "We have no power to deal for the Provinces, and we have no desire to influence their action with respect to these things." Is not that the language substantially in that letter? I am quoting entirely from memory. In order to be sure about it I will refer to it.

With respect to the discussions that have taken place concerning the duties upon the several grades of pulp, printing paper, etc.—mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, bleached and unbleached, news-printing paper and other printing paper and board made from wood pulp, of the value not exceeding 4 cents per pound at the place of shipment—we note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands.

It seems to me that if these ministers in fact desire that the exchange of these commodities should be mutual and reciprocal, they might have done at least as much as the executive department did with regard to this whole arrangement, namely, agree that they would use every effort and all the influence they had to induce the Provinces to so modify their laws that these commodities might come into the United States free. I observe a great deal more delicacy on the part of these commissioners in treating with their Provinces than I observe in the general relation between the executive department of our own Government and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks that the House bill, without the second proviso, is in conformity with the agreement?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not. I said that originally. I think it omits the prescription of the conditions under which our manufacturers of these articles are to enter Canada free.

Mr. SMOOT. In the bill as it now stands, if it should become a law, there is no word in it that would even signify that paper could go from the United States into Canada free under any circumstances or conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is absolutely nothing. I agree to that. It is, of course, a just criticism of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Would there be any opposition on the part of the Senator from Iowa if the House bill had included the second proviso?

Mr. CUMMINS. The suggestions I am now making, of course, would have been entirely irrelevant. I could not have made the objection to the House bill, if it had been so framed, that I am now making to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator does not claim that if the second proviso had been in the bill it would have been contrary to the agreement in any way?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; of course I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator thinks that the second proviso is to be considered by itself?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. And apart from the remainder of the paragraph?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is an integral part of the entire matter; it is to be considered with what precedes it. The only difficulty that the Senator from Utah seems to have is that by its very words it refers to conditions upon which we are to enter Canada, whereas he desires to make it refer to conditions upon which Canada enters the United States. There is just that difference between the two things. As I said before, the House bill is defective, because it does not contain any restriction with regard to conditions under which we shall have free trade with Canada, and the amendment proposed by the committee is defective or wrong, because it attaches another condition to the free admission of paper into the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. My position is, Mr. President, that the second proviso does specifically refer to the remainder of the paragraph, and that both provisions must be included in the bill to make it perfect.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that entirely, Mr. President; and if the committee or anyone who is in favor of this bill—I would not venture, of course, to correct it in that respect—will change it so that it recites precisely what the original arrangement recites and in the same way, the objection I am now making would entirely disappear. The amendment, however, does not restore the bill to the form in which it was originally agreed upon, but introduces an entirely new condition upon which wood pulp and paper shall enter the United States, whereas under the arrangement as originally made just as soon as Canada passes her bill and we pass our bill—if we ever do—there will at once begin the inflow of free paper from certain parts of Canada.

Under the bill as it is proposed to be amended by the Senator from New York we shall never receive any free paper or free wood pulp from Canada until every restriction in every Province in Canada is removed from the export of these articles. That is the difference between the original arrangement and the one which is now proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, mark you—if the Senator from Utah will permit me—I do not care to discuss it any further unless I can answer some question. I have said what I have largely from an academic standpoint. It would make no difference with my vote whether it was in exact accordance with the arrangement or whether it was out of harmony with it. I oppose it because I believe it is wrong and because I want to hasten the day that will witness the free admission of print paper from Canada to the United States. I close by saying I would vastly prefer the admission of free wood pulp, instead of free print paper; but that seems to be unattainable at this time, and therefore it is useless to waste our strength in discussing it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for his courtesy to me already extended, and I will promise him that this will be probably the only question I shall ask.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator very gladly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been somewhat troubled as to whether under section 2 of the bill we are going to get free paper from Canada or from any part of Canada. This agreement was made between the two Governments—not between the Provinces of Canada and the Government of the United States, but between two sovereign Governments. The provision in section 2 is—I shall not read the first part of it, but naming pulp, wood, paper, and so forth—when imported therefrom—

That is, from Canada—

directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

That is the arrangement between the two Governments, and not between certain Provinces of Canada and the United States. It seems to me that that language is so broad that it is a pretty difficult matter to differentiate, and say that we can get free paper from the Provinces that do not have an export duty, but that we can not get it from the Provinces that have such a duty. It looks to me as though that provision were broad enough to absolutely exclude the getting of paper from Canada at all, if we pass this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand, Mr. President, all the difficulties that would be discovered in attempting to enforce these custom regulations. Without admitting that the criticism of the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely well founded, I concede that we might be compelled to station an inspector in the woods and follow the log from that point until it reappears in some mill as paper.

Mr. CLAPP. Would not the inspector have to go into the tank and see how much of the product of the log that came from the provincial Crown lands went into the roll of paper and how much of the log that came from the private owned lands went into the same roll of paper?

Mr. CUMMINS. He might be compelled to make some inquiries that physically are impossible. I am not to be understood as defending the extraordinary phraseology that is used in this matter. I am simply insisting that we must not cut off all hope of getting free paper or free pulp by adding the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I quite agree with him that it is a travesty to speak of this matter as a treaty; but assuming that there is some kind of an understanding, would it infringe at all upon that understanding as to the benefit Canada is to get from this bill to strike out all of the conditions precedent?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not answer that question, because I do not know how highly Canada values the opportunity to enter our market from a very restricted territory.

Mr. CLAPP. But if we enlarge that opportunity, there certainly could be no infringement in spirit of the agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that Canada would hail with great delight the enlargement of this provision so as to remove all question whatsoever.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, if we have reached the point in our economic development where we are ready to put paper on the free list, why would it not be better to avoid all these complications by simply providing that paper from Canada should be on the free list, instead of sending a man into the tank to ascertain what proportion of the roll of paper came from the different sources?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that I would quite agree with that, because there is an obvious injustice in putting a premium upon the practice of Canada in levying export duties. I should like to join in some effort that would present an inducement to Canada, or to the Provinces, to remove their export duties and their restrictions, rather than present an inducement to maintain them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. Just for a word.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to direct the attention of the honorable Senator to the fact that my question was somewhat broader than any answer that has been made. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa, who analyzes matters so closely and accurately—at his leisure, not now—that he will carefully read and consider the terms of section 2 of this bill, and see whether or not, unless we are dealing with the Provinces, it does not appear in the text of the bill that we are putting ourselves in an attitude where we will not get any paper from Canada free? I wish the Senator would examine that very carefully.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to review again the phraseology of the section.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that if it be the correct interpretation of this provision that under it we could receive no free print paper from Canada, then I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire would favor it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would be delighted if that should be the result, because I want to protect the paper industry of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, there is another question relating to this section about which I should like to interrogate the Senator from Iowa. I understand the interpretation placed upon this section is that paper, pulp wood, and so forth, may be admitted on the condition that from that Province or locality no export duty is levied. Is that restricted to the specific article admitted?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion, the first condition, namely, the condition which prescribes the terms under which these articles shall come into the United States, involves the absolute identity of the log, the wood pulp, and the paper made out of that wood pulp and out of that log. I do not think, however, that the second proviso, which fixes the condition under which our articles go into Canada, whenever they do go there free, is so limited or restricted.

Mr. BURTON. I do not believe the Senator from Iowa quite understood my question. Perhaps I did not make it clear. Does this free admission apply to anything more than the paper or pulp which is admitted free; that is, supposing a consignment of pulp or paper is presented at our customhouse? That is admitted free, provided there is no export duty or other charge. Does that apply to other admissions? Is it governed by a general rule relating to that Province or one relating to that particular consignment?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my judgment the latter.

Mr. BURTON. And it is confined to that alone?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my interpretation of the proviso.

Mr. BURTON. So that it can not be enlarged beyond the specific importation?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my interpretation.

Now, Mr. President, I have occupied vastly more time than I intended, but, as is nearly always the case, we drift into the discussion of a great many things that seem to be somewhat irrelevant to the issue to be decided. I can only repeat again, that I oppose this amendment because it is an obstruction to the relief which we ask, and which I think the American publishers ought to have against the conspiracy of the paper manufacturers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, some confusion seems to have arisen in this discussion from time to time as to the nature of section 2. In the first place, I shall aim to point out and demonstrate that section 2 of the bill is entirely beyond the purview and scope of the reciprocity treaty so called. For the purpose of demonstrating this, I call attention to Senate Document 787, third session Sixty-first Congress, being the message of the President sent to Congress on the 26th of January last. In that document next to the message of the President appears the letter from the Canadian commissioners to the Secretary of State, with schedules annexed. That is the basis of the agreement. That is the proposition from the Canadians to our Government. On page 2 of the document, in paragraph 5, is the following:

5. As respects a considerable list of articles produced in both countries, we have been able to agree that they shall be reciprocally free. A list of the articles to be admitted free of duty into the United States when imported from Canada, and into Canada when imported from the United States, is set forth in Schedule A.

In Schedule A, accompanying this communication, we find a paragraph in respect to pulp wood, wood pulp, and news-print paper. I will read the whole paragraph. It contains two provisos:

Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached or unbleached; news-print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper.

That is in Schedule A accompanying this letter. Here is the first proviso accompanying that:

Provided, That such paper and board, valued at 4 cents per pound or less, and wood pulp, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise) or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly) shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Here is the next proviso:

Provided also, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States.

Here are two restrictions. Under this reciprocity arrangement, proposed by the Canadian commissioners, in order to admit Canadian paper, Canadian pulp, and Canadian pulp wood into the United States there must be no restriction on the manufacture or importation of it in any part of Canada; and it is only when those restrictions are removed that our pulp, our wood, and our paper can be admitted into Canada. That is the reciprocal agreement that was proposed. In respect to this part of the agreement the Canadian commissioners, on page 2 of the same document, in paragraph 10, state:

10. With respect to the discussions that have taken place concerning the duties upon the several grades of pulp, printing paper, etc.—mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, bleached and unbleached, news-printing paper and other printing paper and board made from wood pulp, of the value not exceeding 4 cents per pound at the place of shipment—we note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands. The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative. Whether the provincial governments will desire to in any way modify their regulations with a view to securing the free admission of pulp and paper from their Provinces into the market of the United States, must be a question for the provincial authorities to decide. In the meantime the present duties on pulp and paper imported from the United States into Canada will remain. Whenever pulp and paper of the classes already mentioned are admitted into the United States free of duty from all parts of Canada, then similar articles, when imported from the United States, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

In reply to this proposal and suggestion on the part of the Canadian commissioners, the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, in his communication of the 21st of January, as found on page 10 of this document, states, among other things, as follows:

It is a matter of some regret on our part that we have been unable to adjust our differences on the subject of wood pulp, pulp wood, and print paper. We recognize the difficulties to which you refer growing out of the nature of the relations between the Dominion and provincial governments, and for the present we must be content with the conditional arrangement which has been proposed in Schedule A attached to your letter.

That makes it perfectly clear that so far as this feature of the reciprocity arrangement is concerned, it hinged on the two conditions or provisos to which I have called the attention of the Senate in my quotation from the communication of Messrs. Fielding and Paterson.

Mr. President, I may say that I have examined this question. There are restrictions in all the Provinces, except Nova Scotia, in respect to the manufacture of pulp wood, wood pulp, and news-print paper. Most of the public forest lands of the Dominion of Canada are the property of the several Provinces. A Province in the Dominion of Canada occupies a similar relation to that Government that one of the States of this Union does to the Federal Government. Each of those Provinces, except Newfoundland, which is not a part of the Dominion, but which is a government by itself, has a local legislature, in most instances composed of one house. They have, in addition to that, what they call a "responsible ministry," patterned after the Dominion Government, which is patterned after the British Government, and they have a lieutenant governor appointed by the Crown, but the executive department in those Provinces is practically, as you know, akin to that of the British Government, being in the hands of a responsible ministry.

I might say further that for years it has been the custom in all these Provinces not to sell their timber lands as we sell ours, but simply to issue licenses or grant what they call timber rights or timber limits. A provincial government will issue a license to A or B to cut timber within given timber limits for a given period of years, but the title to the land remains in the Province. In all these Provinces, with the exception of New Brunswick——

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. In the lease contracts that the Dominion Government executes with A and B, as recited by the Senator, there is contained usually, in fact always now in most of the Provinces, certain stipulations and conditions with reference to the product of the timber. In many of the leases the contract is made that it shall be manufactured in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. NELSON. That is the rule now in all the Provinces, except in the Province of Nova Scotia, where there is practically no timber.

Mr. BROWN. That is my understanding. That amounts to a prohibition of the export of pulp wood.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; and of paper.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly; the product of the wood pulp.

Mr. NELSON. The product of the wood pulp and pulp wood in all cases. To show the temper of these Provinces on this subject the Province of New Brunswick, which had no restriction at the time this message was sent in from the President on the 11th of April this last spring, passed an act similar to that contained in the laws and regulations of Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia. They all have restrictions.

Now, the principal amount of pulp wood in British Columbia is east of the Cascade Mountains, and the restriction in respect to that matter is that it must be manufactured there. The pulp wood must be manufactured into wood pulp and into news-print paper right then and there. That is the only condition under which they can obtain from the provincial government the right to cut timber. The same rule prevails in the Province of Ontario, and the same rule applies in the Province of Quebec.

In the three Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, the prairie Provinces, as they are called, between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains, the timberlands that are left—and they are quite limited—are retained by the Dominion Government. They are lands that lie to the north of the great area of prairie in that country. The timber is rather stunted and inferior, mostly spruce, some poplar, and a little bit of pine. But the Canadian Government, for the purpose of promoting the settlement of those prairie Provinces, has created, in the first instance, 16 forest reserves, and then, in respect to the other lands that are not included in the forest reserves, it does not sell any lands or grant any timber rights but to the homestead settlers who go up there and locate on the lands. They give them a permit to cut timber for a limited time in order to give them a start.

Now, those are the conditions up in that country. I do not believe that any of those Provinces will change their timber regulations. In all the Provinces, counting from the east, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia, and including the three prairie Provinces that I have named, the restrictions are somewhat similar and in substance this, Mr. President: That the timber from which pulp wood or wood pulp is made must be manufactured into wood pulp and into print paper in the Province of Canada. They are so careful about it that they even specify that the mere cutting of the timber into what we call cordwood lengths, limited sticks 2 or 3 feet long, shall not be deemed manufacturing under those provisions. So that absolutely all public lands in all those Provinces, aside from Nova Scotia, which has next to nothing of timber, are subject to these restrictions.

Now, what is section 2 of the bill? It is utterly outside of the purview of the so-called reciprocity agreement. What does it cover and what can it affect? In view of the conditions which I have stated and specified to the Senate, all that that provision of the bill can affect and reach to-day is lands in private ownership. If any of the Senators own a section of land in Ontario or in Quebec or in British Columbia to which they have secured a fee title, and they themselves impose no restrictions, the wood pulp and pulp wood and the news-print paper made of timber on that private land can come in free.

I call attention to the phraseology of the bill, if Senators will turn to a copy of it. On page 23:

Shall be admitted free of duty—

That is pulp wood, wood pulp, and news-print paper—

shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper—

Mark the words—

shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

So, Mr. President, in the light of the facts, in the light of the law and regulations prevailing in those Provinces and existing to-day, and in the light of the whole reciprocity agreement, construing this bill as it must necessarily be construed by its own terms, it can only apply to-day to wood pulp and pulp wood and news-print paper manufactured from timber on lands in private ownership and can not extend to anything else.

Mr. President, there is one feature to which I wish to call the attention of Senators. We might as well be candid about this matter. There are a good many of our people—people in Michigan and some of the great newspapers in New York—who own privately lands in Canada, and by enacting this we give those Americans, who have gone up there and have bought those lands and hold them in private ownership a privilege and an advantage over Americans on this side of the line who own our own timber lands. The great newspapers in New York that hold some of these lands in private ownership can get the paper in here free, while you or I, who may happen to own a tract of timber on this side of the line, can not get any of the paper from our timber into Canada free. Now, that is the condition of it.

I know it is popular to favor helping the newspapers of this country, but there is something more in this. You are helping Americans who own stumpage in Canada to get a privilege that our own people in this country do not have. That is the real question.

I am sorry to see the Senator from Iowa, pandering to the clamor in some of the newspapers of this country, carried away by his zeal and overlooking the fact that this provision is simply to raise the stumpage of those Americans who are fortunate enough to have bought timberlands in Canada. This is the plain English of the whole situation, and we may fool the newspapers, we may fool the American people a little while, but the best plan, Senators, is to be candid with the American people and just tell them what there is in this legislative gold brick.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bailey	Culberson	Nelson	Smoot
Borah	Cullom	Overman	Sutherland
Bourne	Cummins	Owen	Swanson
Bradley	Curtis	Penrose	Thornton
Bristow	Dixon	Perkins	Townsend
Brown	Foster	Poindexter	Warren
Bryan	Gallinger	Pomerene	Wetmore
Burnham	Gore	Reed	Williams
Burton	Gronna	Root	Works
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Shively
Clapp	McCumber	Simmons
Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is unavoidably detained in the Lorimer investigation.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is engaged in committee work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask a question or two, and I will direct them to the Senator from Minnesota. I understood the Senator from Minnesota to suggest that there were certain restrictions in the Provinces with reference to the output of timber which constituted an obstacle against the operation of this bill. Am I correct in that?

Mr. NELSON. On public lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I would call the attention of the Senator to the constitution of Canada, or the act usually denominated the constitution of Canada, which gives the Dominion the absolute right at its pleasure to control or repeal any provision of a Province.

If that is true, then that could not legitimately be urged as an obstacle.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call attention to what the commissioners say in their letter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have read what they say. I have it before me.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson, in their communication, say:

> 10. With respect to the discussions that have taken place concerning the duties upon the several grades of pulp, printing paper, etc.—mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, bleached and unbleached, news-printing paper, and other printing paper and board made from wood pulp, of the value not exceeding 4 cents per pound at the place of shipment—we note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary—> that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is clear that they do not use the term "right" there as equivalent to the word "power," because in the constitution, section 122, the power to change those laws is expressly reserved to the Dominion. I read it:

> The customs and excise laws of each Province shall, subject to the provisions of this act, continue in force until altered by the Parliament of Canada.

That question has arisen several times, and the Provinces have strongly contended and contested against the right of the Dominion to change those laws.

Mr. NELSON. Read that again and you will see it relates to customs and excises. It does not cover the matter of duty. It covers other restrictions outside of that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that is intended to refer to the excises and customs laws of the Provinces.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no. It refers to the other restrictions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just one moment, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. Fielding, in speaking of it, speaks of it as a constitutional right of the Provinces. So evidently his belief is that they have a constitutional right, unfettered by the Dominion.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the local constitutional right, but that is subject always to the Dominion Parliament, and that right was preserved to the Dominion in the original act creating the Provinces. That contest has been fought out over and over, and the Dominion has always prevailed. The Provinces have contested for that, but upon a test of the right of the respective governments the right of the Dominion has been held to be superior and reserved to it in the original act.

I think the commissioners there simply mean that under the existing law it is true that the Dominion probably has granted these rights to several Provinces, but it has in the constitution the right to take them back in the interest of the public, and I could refer the Senator, only from recollection, to an article upon this question—I think it was in the International Encyclopedia that I first saw it—in which a review of this question will be found, and also an article upon Canada in a topical reference, the technical name of which I do not recollect. But it is a question that is open to the interpretation that I have placed upon it.

Then again, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the provision in article 91, where the Dominion reserved the right——

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in respect to this reciprocity agreement this is purely academic, because in the reciprocity agreement it is expressly provided that it must be in harmony with the regulations of the several Provinces.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. NELSON. And they have said that they have no disposition to interfere.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another question. The question of power and the question of disposition are very different.

Mr. NELSON. They deny the power in this letter—two of the ministers.

Mr. HEYBURN. They use the word "right." That may be the moral right or ethical right, but they do not say they have not the power.

Mr. NELSON. They do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now turn to section 11.

Mr. NELSON. Let me read this to the Senator:

> We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the constitution granted by the Dominion of Canada, subject to the control of the Dominion Government. Each of the Provinces has such an instrument, which they call their constitution. It is not a constitution in the ordinary sense in which we use that term. It is an act creating the Provinces by the Dominion, with certain reserved powers in the Dominion. Now, I will read one of the reserved powers. I read from article 91, paragraph 2:

> The powers reserved to the Dominion Government against the Provinces. Second. The regulation of trade and commerce.

Now, you give that the scope that is given in this country when that term is used and it covers this question.

Mr. NELSON. Not at all. A regulation of trade and commerce would never relate to a question of timber rights. If the State of Minnesota owns a certain quantity of timber in that State and it leases that timber to me upon the condition that I shall cut that timber and manufacture it into pulp and paper in the State of Minnesota, and only cut it on that condition, what right has the Federal Government under the law to interfere?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a contractual right between the Government and the party holding under it. But the Dominion of Canada, subject to the power of the Crown, has always held that it had the same relative right to regulate commerce that the United States has, and that is the language we use—to regulate commerce—that is, commerce with foreign countries.

Mr. NELSON. Commerce.

Mr. HEYBURN. They speak of it in different language when they refer to commerce between the different Provinces.

Mr. NELSON. Does commerce have any relation to conditions surrounding the cutting of timber?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not to cutting timber, but the right, in opposition to the claim of these Provinces, to establish terms upon which timber may be exported from the Provinces.

Now, the Dominion of Canada can relieve any Province of the embarrassment of any regulation or any law that they may have in regard to the exportation of timber.

Mr. NELSON. That does not seem to be the opinion of the commissioners.

Mr. HEYBURN. It depends upon the application——

Mr. NELSON. And the Senator seems to be better advised as to the rules and constitutional rights of the Provinces of Canada than the members of the Dominion ministry.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I am reading from the constitution.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the use of that word "right," as I say, is not the equivalent of the word "power."

Mr. NELSON. They use the word "power" in the quotation I made.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. Now, here, for instance, in the language of this bill under consideration, after leading up to it, referring to pulp wood, and so forth—

when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise, directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

Now, the language there is, "when those burdens shall have been imposed upon such paper." But the construction that is sought to be placed upon this, as I understand the Senator from Minnesota and other Senators here, is that the act, for instance, that was recently passed by the New Brunswick parliament would be effective against the exercise of this right of exportation. That language does not bear it out. The language is, "shall have been imposed upon such article." It does not say by whom. I have a right to infer, and it is a fair inference, that that means imposed by the Dominion Government of Canada.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Idaho was not present this afternoon when I raised that very question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not present.

Mr. GALLINGER. My point was that we were not dealing with any Province of Canada in that provision, but two great Governments were making an arrangement of some kind or other.

Mr. HEYBURN. And it refers to restrictions by the Government and not by Provinces.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was my contention. I may not be right.

Mr. HEYBURN. That would be the construction I would place upon it. Otherwise it would have said restrictions placed upon it by any Province. But Canada is dealing here as an imperial government subject only to the control of the English Government. She is dealing under her constitutional rights, and her constitutional rights give her the right to abrogate the law of a Province if it is contrary to that which she desires to do.

I desire at this late hour only to point this out because it is not without merit. If the Dominion of Canada has imposed an export duty, then there is no restriction against the exportation of this wood, in whatever form it may be. On the products of the wood I find in an examination of the law—and I have spent some time; I may not have exhausted the subject entirely—that there is at present no export duty nor restriction in the laws of the Dominion of Canada.

I desire before taking my seat to call attention to another proposition here, that was referred to in connection with this question:

Tariff resolutions pending in the Canadian Parliament January 26, 1911.

Mr. Fielding, in committee of ways and means, offers the resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the customs tariff, 1907, and to provide as follows.

I have not heard reference, although it may have been made in my absence, to this proposition:

1. That the articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, specified in Schedule A, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty when imported from the United States.

2. That the articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, specified in Schedules B and D, shall be admitted into Canada upon payment of the rates of duty specified in the said schedules when imported from the United States.

But here is the point to which I desire to call your attention:

That the advantages hereby granted to the United States shall extend to any and every other foreign power which may be entitled thereto under the provisions of any treaty or convention with His Majesty.

That the advantages hereby granted to the United States shall extend to the United Kingdom and the several British colonies and possessions with respect to their commerce with Canada: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be held to increase any rate of duty now provided for in the British preferential tariff.

Mr. President, the effect of that is that we do not go into Canada as a preferred commercial agency. We go in there in competition with the same conditions that are granted to any other country. Any other country may obtain the same conditions that are given under this proposed bill. So the advantages of the Canadian market are not exclusive to this country. Any other country comes in there on the same terms as we go into the country as competitors with every other country in the world. Where is the great advantage that we derive?

Mr. GALLINGER. They come in here without competition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; they come into the American market without competition with any other country, because we give such terms to no other country, unless we shall be compelled under the favored-nation clause, and we go into their country in competition with every other country in the world on the same terms that country receives. And that is called reciprocity!

I merely call attention to these facts. I will not attempt to enlarge on them at this hour, but I had them in mind from the discussion that has been going on. I think it is safe to say that the reference in the bill is to the restrictions of the Canadian Government and not the restrictions of the Provinces.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I suggest to members of the Finance Committee to let the bill go over for to-day and it can be taken up in the morning. We had better take an adjournment now.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to have a brief executive session.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 23, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1334) to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW., from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW., through lot No. 800, square No. 2718, to submit an adverse report (No. 87) thereon, and I ask that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 2865) granting an increase of pension to Francis M. Ward (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 2866) for adjudication and determination of the rights and equities of the widow and family of Marcus P. Norton and the heirs at law, assigns, legatees, or legal representatives of others; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 2867) granting an increase of pension to Nancy Jane Tracy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURNHAM:

A bill (S. 2868) granting a pension to Annie S. Diamond (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2869) granting an increase of pension to Daniel D. Whitney (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2870) to regulate the importation and interstate transportation of nursery stock, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests, to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2871) for the relief of the heirs of William Weeks; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 2872) to require dealers in meats, fruits, and vegetables in the District of Columbia to protect the same from flies, insects, and dust; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

RATES OF POSTAGE (S. DOC. NO. 54).

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill, which I send to the desk. It is very brief, and I ask to have the Secretary read it for the information of the Senate.

The bill (S. 2873) fixing the rate of postage to be charged for the transmission of mail within the United States or its possessions was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act no higher postage rate shall be charged for the transmission of mail entirely within the United States or its possessions than is charged for transmission of mail partly within and partly without the United States or its possessions. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and required to establish and enforce rules and regulations which will give the people of the United States rights and privileges in the use of the United States mails as liberal as the rights and privileges the United States accords to the people of the most favored nation.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, it may seem strange to Members of the Senate that there should be a possibility of legislation giving American citizens privileges in the United States mails between themselves equal with those enjoyed by residents of this country in transaction of business with residents of foreign countries. The facts are these: Within the United States the rate of postage on fourth-class matter is 16 cents a pound, with a limit of 4 pounds. The United States is party to a treaty under which residents of 29 foreign countries may send fourth-class matter through the United States mails at 12 cents a pound, with a limit of 11 pounds. In other words, a man may send an 11-pound package from San Francisco to Rome, Italy, at 12 cents a pound, but if he wishes to send the same articles to New York he must divide them into packages of not to exceed 4 pounds each and pay 16 cents a pound. A Japanese residing in New York can send an 11-pound package to his friends in Tokyo at 12 cents, but an American in New York can send only a 4-pound package from New York to Washington and must pay 16 cents a pound.

Mr. President, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of both Senate and House have under consideration bills for the establishment of parcels post. In my opinion the specific provisions of such a bill should be fixed only after the most careful investigation. I believe Congress will establish a parcels-post rate at less than 12 cents a pound and a rate very much less than that for short hauls. But whatever the ultimate action on the question of parcels post, I see no reason for delay in the enactment of this law giving American citizens as favorable postal facilities as this Government extends to residents of foreign countries. Especially is this true when investigation by the Post Office Department shows that the cost of transporting fourth-class matter is approximately 12 cents a pound. The passage of this bill will in no way conflict with any subsequent legislation on the subject of parcels post.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], coupled with the statement he has made, is going to call for a great deal of correspondence upon this subject, and it occurred to me that it would facilitate our correspondence if the remarks of the Senator from Oregon could be printed as a Senate document, so that we could have them to inclose in response to inquiries for this kind of data. I therefore make the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], just made, be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to have the bill printed likewise?

Mr. CLAPP. I am not so particular about that. A very brief statement of the bill would be carried, of course, by the press, and the carrying of the statement of the bill by the press would make calls for the correspondence.

LAND IN FULTON COUNTY, GA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BACON. I ask permission of the Senate for the consideration, by unanimous consent, of the bill (S. 2462) to cede jurisdiction to the State of Georgia over certain land in Fulton County. It will take but a moment. It is a matter of some importance to my State.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF RURAL DELIVERY ROADS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate Senate bill 2846, upon which the Senator from North Carolina has given notice he will address the Senate this morning.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2846) for experimental improvement of rural delivery roads by the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the Postmaster General, for investigating the subject of Federal registration and license of automobiles used in interstate travel, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the industries of the country may be classified into agricultural, manufacturing, and transportation.

All of these industries are of great importance, but as agriculture provides food for the people, markets for manufactures, and business to transportation, it is entitled to preeminence as being our basic industry.

During the colonial period of our existence and for many years after the revolution, agriculture was the chief, almost the sole, occupation of our people. We had no manufacturing, and our only means of transportation was by water and the ordinary wagon road.

In these conditions the necessity of diversifying the pursuits of the people, of supplying their needs for manufactures, and providing more efficient transportation for the distribution of their products became a subject of grave consideration.

How were these desirable and necessary results to be brought about? On account of the general poverty of the people it was manifest that individual resource and effort were wholly inadequate to meet the demand. The situation suggested inquiry into the duty and powers of the Government in the premises and led to an exhaustive discussion by leaders of thought in those early days of every phase of the question, resulting in the adoption by the Government of a policy which has continued to the present day.

From that time to this the Government has sought by legislation and otherwise to encourage and foster the industries of the people by supplementing individual effort with pecuniary aid.

Before the era of railroads ambitious projects for public highways were devised and entered upon, and millions were contributed from the Public Treasury and domain for their construction, while great schemes were projected and worked out for the improvement of rivers and harbors and for connecting the waterways of the country by artificial canals.

However, it was not until after the Civil War that the Government entered upon that broad, comprehensive, and liberal system of Government cooperation and aid which has led to such marvelous results in the development of manufacturing and transportation. While every tariff act since the formation of the Government in 1789 has given assistance to the upbuilding of manufactures, the legislation of the last 50 years has been of surpassing liberality, and the aggregate contributions of the people during that period to this end have been stupendous.

As a result, this industry has in an incredibly short time, starting from practically nothing, developed into a system unequaled in magnitude and in efficiency of operation by that of any other nation upon the earth.

The same policy has been pursued with reference to rail-and-water transportation. The contributions of the National Government to railroads in land grants and otherwise, and of the States, counties, townships, cities, and towns, through stock and bond subscriptions, reach into billions. The land grants alone contributed by the Government aggregate nearly 200,000,000 acres.

So, likewise, with reference to our waterway transportation. Wherever it has been shown that commerce would be benefited by the improvement of our rivers and harbors, the Government has not withheld such amounts as seemed reasonably necessary to provide for the transportation needs of the community affected. Millions upon millions are being expended for this purpose year by year, with ever-increasing liberality, and the time is not far distant when by reason of these contributions of the people every harbor and every navigable stream will have such facilities and depth as may be needed to accommodate its present and prospective commerce. Not only this, but the great water systems of the country will be linked together by artificial channels, and, at an expense to the Government which would a few years ago have appalled the world, the two great oceans which bound our continent on the east and west will be connected by a channel dug through mountains and of sufficient depth to accommodate the deepest draft vessels of the world.

I do not mean, of course, to underestimate the important part played by private capital and energy in advancing our transportation and manufacturing to their present state of efficiency and completeness, nor do I doubt that this result would have been accomplished through individual effort in the course of time, but without this pecuniary aid of the people, acting through their Governments, National and State, the progress to this end would have been comparatively slow and the consummation long delayed.

What has the Government done to foster and promote agriculture—that industry on which our very existence depends, which has done its part in building up the country, which has indeed made possible the growth of manufactures, the construction of our transportation lines, the rapid development of our banking and stock interests, and without which our cities and towns would at once fall into decay and ruin; an industry that creates wealth not only for itself but for all other industries, which occupies nearly 40 per cent of our population, whose exertions convert the elements of nature into commodities that have an annual value of $9,000,000,000?

It is true there are some branches of agriculture that have heretofore participated in the bounties of the tariff, but it is now sought and proposed to take from the farmer all direct participation in these supposed benefactions.

It is true that something has been done in recent years to aid in teaching scientific agriculture and better cultural methods, but the amount contributed for this purpose, though something, is small when compared with other Government contributions to national objects of far less importance.

It is also true that the farmer's demand for improved mail facilities has to some extent been granted, but the amount expended to this end is no greater than that expended for city delivery, and is only a tardy recognition of a constitutional right, and is far below what the farmer needs and should have. Not only this, but the installation and expansion of the rural delivery has been impeded by many hindrances and obstacles, and in its administration there are and have been manifest discriminations. The officials employed to serve him are discriminated against, in salary, in the hours of labor, and in the matter of equipment needed to discharge their duty.

After years of struggle the service has been extended until now it reaches something like two-thirds of our rural population, but the service rendered is meager compared with what it should be and what is needed and demanded, and could be given with but slight increase in cost.

The service is so admirably adapted to accommodating cheap and quick parcels delivery that it actually suggests the installation of this additional service, not only as a revenue measure but as a matter of local convenience and saving, on the one hand, and as extending to the dwellers in the country, through the mails, at least the same advantages enjoyed in the city through the medium of the express companies.

Five or six years ago I introduced in committee an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill providing for a rural parcels post. It was adopted by the committee and the Senate, but was stricken out in conference.

That the farmer has received so little aid and encouragement from the Government is probably ascribable to the fact that he has not been assertive. He is becoming more assertive now, and wisely so. He is organizing, and, while these organizations are holding aloof from partisan politics, the farmers of the country, irrespective of party affiliations, are disposed to demand that their interests and needs shall receive fair and impartial consideration from Congress and the Government.

It is a rare thing that the farmer goes to his State legislature or comes to the National Congress to present to the lawmakers his grievances or his demands, because, being fair dealing, honest, and patriotic himself, he accords those virtues to others and trusts his representatives to deal fairly with him and his interest.

Only once during the 10 years since I have been in the Senate have the farmers come in large numbers before a great committee of this body either protesting or demanding.

Recently, when there was pending before the great Committee on Finance a measure vitally affecting their interests, by which it was proposed to apply one rule to the things they sell and a different rule to the things they buy, they came, not as suppliants and beggars, not lobbying around the hotels of the Capital and the Chamber and corridors of the Senate, but before the committee in open session. They came in numbers from many States, some of them far distant from the Capital. A more intelligent and determined set of men I have never seen.

Yet how were they treated? Kindly and with every consideration by the committee, but there it ended. Rebuffed and defied by the administration to which they had appealed for fair treatment and alternately ignored and jeered at by the metropolitan press of the country, they departed discouraged and disheartened.

Yet, Mr. President, I have an idea that these farmers are coming back here again, and that more are coming with them; and that when they come there will be here occupying a majority of these seats those who will listen and hear and heed what they have to say.

But, Mr. President, I have digressed and strayed far afield.

I was discussing the duty of the Government to show the same fostering care to that great primary and basic industry in which 40 per cent of our population is engaged as it has been its wont to show to other important industries of the country.

While I do not wish or mean to minimize what has been done, it can not be denied that what the Government has contributed for agriculture is but a bagatelle compared with what it has done for transportation and manufacturing, and that measurably, as a result of this discriminatory treatment, these industries have grown and expanded far in excess of agriculture. The effect of this discrimination is strikingly illustrated by the fact that while in manufacturing and transportation we have caught up with and passed, in agriculture we have lagged behind, and far behind, the more progressive nations, both in cultural methods and in productiveness per unit.

Mr. President, every consideration of justice and sound public policy would seem to condemn this neglect of this great and important industry. Upon the basis of his own merit and the public weal the farmer is entitled to the highest consideration at the hands of the Government. Indeed, there is no class of people to whom the country owes more than to the farmers.

It is they who through the hardships and trials of pioneer life subdued and made habitable the vast wilderness stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific; it is they who have borne the burdens of those tariff laws that have contributed so largely to the development of our manufacturing; it is they who have chiefly furnished the traffic that has made railroading profitable and the gratuities which have so largely stimulated their construction; it is they who have sustained the balance of world trade in our favor and brought to our shores a constant stream of foreign gold; it is they who have contributed most largely to the production of the national wealth; and it is they who have been our main dependence in peace and our bulwark of safety in war.

The crop of the farmer fixes the standard of the Nation's prosperity. Indeed, so potential is the farmer's crop in its influence upon the business and the prosperity of the country that the bare prospect of a good crop quickens the energies and activities of the people, stimulates and vitalizes every department of trade, while the rumor of a poor crop demoralizes prices, checks trade, and breeds commercial stagnation, and when these fears and hopes materialize in a good or bad crop, as the case may be, the bad or good effect is felt in every branch of industry and in every line of endeavor.

The present condition of this great industry, whether considered in connection with the profits which it yields as compared with the profits of other industries, or in connection with our foreign trade or our domestic needs, challenges and admonishes a more liberal consideration and treatment on the part of the Government than it has received in the past or is at present receiving.

If we are to maintain the equilibrium between our city and country population, if we are to maintain the equilibrium between those engaged in trade, in transportation, in commerce, and manufacturing with those engaged in agricultural pursuits, farm life must be made more attractive and the pursuit of agriculture more profitable.

A brief summary will suffice to show that unless the present trend from the farm to the town is checked at no distant day we will cease to be an exporter of agricultural products, and the main source of our balance in world trade will vanish, leaving us a world debtor instead of a world creditor.

Of course, I do not mean to say that there will not be a continuing expansion in agriculture and a continuous increase in its production, but it is apparent that that expansion and increase will not keep pace with the increase in our consumptive capacity and economic requirements. Indeed, the statistics of the last few years show that our consumption has already nearly overtaken our production.

During the five years beginning with 1890 our people consumed annually an average of 300,000,000 bushels of wheat.

During the next five years the annual consumption averaged 350,000,000 bushels.

During the next five years the consumption was 460,000,000 bushels.

Now the consumption is about 600,000,000 bushels annually.

Our large crop still leaves some surplus for export, but of the great crop of 1909, when the production was 725,000,000 bushels, we exported only 63,000,000 bushels of unground wheat.

In 1910 the export was 42,000,000 bushels, and for the 10 months ending in April, 1911, virtually the year, the export was less than 22,000,000 bushels; and more than one-half of that was from Oregon and Washington.

Of all breadstuffs we exported in 1908, $205,000,000 worth; the following year, $150,000,000 worth; the next year, $121,000,000 worth; and for the year ending June, 1911, there will be a falling off of some $15,000,000 from that figure.

From this it is apparent that our exports of breadstuffs are diminishing.

Similarly our exports of cattle are falling off. In 1904 we exported 593,000 cattle; five years later only 208,000; in 1910 about 125,000, and for the 10 months of 1911, virtually the year, only 94,000. Our imports of cattle from Mexico were, in 1908, only 63,000; in 1910 they were 188,000; and for the year ending June, 1911, they will be more than 200,000. Thus it appears that we import more cattle than we export, and, although we still export fresh beef, that item is also falling off.

It is evident that the period is not far distant when we will have need here at home for all the provisions we raise.

Up to the present, agriculture has been the main reliance for the sound financial condition of the country. It has maintained the balance of trade in our favor.

In 1908 we exported:

Foodstuffs (crude)	$189,000,000
Foodstuffs (manufactured)	331,000,000
Cotton	437,000,000

The value of our agricultural products exported in 1907 reached $1,050,000,000. That was the high-water mark. Since then there has been a considerable decline in all except cotton. A heavy loss in these products would leave the balance of trade against us, resulting in unsettling our currency, disturbing conditions, reducing values, and arresting prosperity.

From this résumé it is apparent that agriculture is the foundation stone of our financial fabric, and every effort should be made to foster and promote it.

There is a market abroad for all the surplus our fields can produce. There is no difficulty in selling the products of this industry. Europe needs all we can spare.

With manufactures it is different. Our manufactures may not be wanted by the world, the products of our factories may become a drug; they may be piled upon the shelves unconsumed, congested, entailing loss, and inviting panics; but our wheat, foods, provisions, and cotton are needed for Europe, and will always find a ready sale abroad. There will be no surfeit of these productions; on the contrary, the outlook is that there may be a serious deficit in them.

Already the relative proportion of population engaged in agriculture is too low, and during the past decade the proportion has continued to diminish.

In the 10 years between 1890 and 1900 the increase in those engaged in agriculture was only 21 per cent, while among those in other occupations it was 32 per cent, and since then this difference has still further increased. The urban population is increasing faster than the rural or agricultural class. Manufacturing, mining, transportation, day laborers, those employed in trade and in mechanical pursuits have unduly increased. The relative increase in agricultural occupations is less than in other lines.

The census bulletin relating to the population of counties in the several States shows that in the tier of great agricultural States from Ohio west, while 600 counties increased in population, 422 decreased. Doubtless the increase in urban population alone kept the other counties from similarly showing a decrease.

In the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, and Michigan there were 313 counties to decrease, while only 266 increased. Such has been the trend of agriculture in that region.

In the South Atlantic States and Cotton States, also including Kentucky, 260 counties fell off, while 1,041 showed an increase.

In North Carolina but 7 counties show a decrease, but if only the rural population be considered, 20 show no increase. Were the same minute examination made as to the counties of the agricultural States of the Northwest, probably it would appear that there has been a falling off of rural population in each of those States.

The towns everywhere have grown at the expense of the country; but the country at the South has not suffered relatively as much as the Northwest has. Our agriculture may be more prosperous, or perhaps there may not be the same demand for labor in the southern towns as elsewhere.

Does not this situation warn us to resort to every method to promote agriculture, not merely for the advantage of the farmer, but for the benefit of all, so that the food supply shall always be adequate, that provisions may be plentiful, that the exports may not be curtailed, that the balance of trade may not be reversed, that the financial condition may not be unsettled, and that the general welfare may be conserved?

The practical question is, How can the Government help the farmer; in what way can it, in present conditions, most promote the interest of agriculture?

By far the most pressing need of the farmer and the most pressing need of the country is good roads and improved highways. We have the finest railways in the world and the poorest highways. The Government has helped to build these railroads and develop this splendid system of long-distance transportation. Why should it not help to build the equally important system of short-distance transportation—the country highways over which the produce of the farm must be hauled before it reaches these national highways?

No one will deny the importance of cheap and quick transportation from ocean to ocean, from port to port, and from city to city. Is not quick and cheap transportation just as essential from the farm to the railway station or to the river landing? Does not the fact that transportation from the farm to the station is 30 times higher than from the station to the point of ultimate distribution appeal for remedy?

If sound public policy requires that so much be done as we have done by legislation and otherwise to cheapen railroad rates, does not the same policy require that something be done to lessen the rate of transportation from the farm to the railroad?

Not only is the subject of good roads the most important which now confronts the farmer and one of the most important now before the people of the country at large, but it is the one in which the people are most deeply interested.

There can be no doubt about the constitutional power of the Government to appropriate money to aid in the construction and improvement of our public roads. That question was fought out in the early days of the Republic.

There can be no escape from the conclusion that the constitutional power to establish post roads is as broad as that to establish post offices, and that the power to establish post roads includes the power to construct, improve, and maintain them.

Aside from considerations of public policy in this matter, I submit that the Government has incurred a moral, if not a legal, liability to contribute at least to the maintenance of public highways of the country by reason of the use which it is making of them in the performance of its constitutional duty to supply the people with mail facilities.

Of the 2,150,000 miles of dirt roads in this country the Government is to-day using over 1,000,000 miles for star routes and Rural Delivery Service. It has established them into post roads, and it is actually using them every day in the year, except Sundays and holidays, to carry the mails.

These roads have been constructed chiefly by the farmers and are maintained by taxes in a large measure paid by them. The Government has contributed nothing to their construction and contributes nothing to their maintenance.

The Government uses the railroads to carry the mails, but it pays for this service, and usually pays a high price for it. On the other hand, it not only uses the farmers' road for the identical purpose without paying a cent for its use or maintenance, but requires the farmer, besides furnishing the road, also to keep it in good condition; and if he fails or refuses to do so, it discontinues his mails.

In conveying the mails to the farmer the Government is not doing a charity, but is performing a duty it can not rightfully escape, and I submit that the Government has no more right to appropriate the farmers' road to its use without compensation than it has to appropriate the railroads to the same use without compensation.

There would therefore seem to be a legal as well as a moral obligation on the part of the Government arising out of the use of these roads to at least contribute to their maintenance.

But, Mr. President, in addition to this there is a strong economic reason in connection with the use of these public highways as post roads why the Government should contribute not only to their maintenance, but to their improvement—it is the saving which will accrue to the Government in the expense of the star route and Rural Delivery Service from good roads.

On account of the establishment of rural delivery 23,000 post offices have been discontinued, aggregating a saving in salaries of $8,000,000; likewise, there has been a discontinuance of star route service to the amount of $18,000,000, cutting off a total of $26,409,000 of expense.

The total mileage of the rural routes in operation on June 30, 1910, was 993,068, the average mileage per route being 24, and the average number of miles of daily travel by rural carriers was 986,993.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly restate the amount of saving by the abolition of post offices, post routes, and star routes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I estimate it at $26,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator the figures, approximately, of the expenditures for the Rural Delivery Service?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have not. I think it is about $40,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. $40,000,000. So that the abolition of the rural post offices and the curtailment of the star route service pays a large portion of the expenses of the Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. SIMMONS. All of it, except about $14,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is very interesting. I am glad to know the fact.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and, as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] suggests to me, the sale of stamps would probably pay that.

The average cost per mile traveled is not quite 12 cents, exclusive of substitutes and of toll and ferriage service. On nearly one-half of the entire roads of the country the Government is now delivering the mails at a cost, say, of 12 cents a mile, and it is plain that any improvement of these roads would reduce the cost of this service.

If through road improvement the time required in covering the route could be lessened one-third or one-fourth, it is obvious that there would be a saving in the cost of the service from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. On the basis of the present mileage, and without adding a single dollar to the present appropriation, the service could be extended from 200,000 to 300,000 miles, carrying the daily mails to hundreds of thousands of farmers who are now denied them.

In addition to these reasons growing out of the direct pecuniary interest of the Government in better roads for mail purposes, I submit that the Government has an indirect and general interest, arising from its duty to promote the public welfare, which invites and justifies its cooperation in the maintenance and improvement of the postal highways.

The prices of products depend not only upon the cost of production, but also upon the cost of distribution. Whatever, therefore, adds to the cost of the transportation necessarily adds to the ultimate cost of the product.

In recognition of this economic principle there has been much congressional legislation in recent years looking toward Government control of railroads, with a view to establishing reasonable transportation rates.

While railroad rates may still be somewhat too high, speaking generally, it may be said that adequate and cheap facilities exist for the carriage of products from the railroad station to the markets. But while this is true, on account of the bad condition of the roads, the initial charge—the cost of hauling from the farm—is excessively high.

The difference in the cost of transportation by rail and by dirt road is as 1 to 30. Of course, this difference is not all due to bad roads, but it is fully twice as great as it would be if the standard of our public roads were put upon a parity with that of our railroads.

This excessive cost is not only a burden upon agriculture, but it is a tax upon the consumer of its product. The value of farm products is computed at $9,000,000,000, and as only two-thirds of this amount is consumed at home, the balance has to be marketed, and the average haul for this purpose from the farm to the railroad is estimated at 9 miles. Of the 2,150,000 miles of road over which this haul must be made, about 175,000 miles have been improved; the balance, or nearly 2,000,000 miles, is still unimproved dirt road.

These roads are at best indifferent, frequently positively bad, and sometimes almost impassable. Annually 300,000,000 tons of farm products are hauled over these roads at a cost estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture at 23 cents per ton-mile. If these roads were improved, he estimates that the cost would be reduced to less than half that amount.

According to consular reports the cost of hauling in Germany, France, and England, where the roads are maintained in the best possible condition—indeed, on my trip to Europe a few years ago I did not see a road that was not macadamized—is frequently as low as 7 or 8 cents per ton-mile.

So, if it costs the farmer, as calculated by the department, $600,000,000 to market his product over our present roads, $300,000,000 could be saved annually if they were put in reasonably good condition, and, if in as good condition as those abroad, a much larger sum—probably $400,000,000.

When I first read this estimate of the Secretary of the probable saving to the farmer from good roads I thought it was too large, but an analytical study of the cost of hauling the cotton crop of the South—a subject with which I am, in a measure, familiar—caused me to revise my conclusion.

Cotton has to be hauled when picked to the gin, and then carried to the market, and the seed are likewise to be hauled. This is only a part of the hauling in connection with the cotton crop. It does not include fertilizer and other items.

A crop of 12,000,000 bales will make 3,000,000 loads. The weight of the seed is about twice that of the lint, and there will be about 6,000,000 loads of seed. Thus there will be about 9,000,000 full loads.

Putting the cost of hauling at $2 per load, it would amount to $18,000,000.

If by good roads that expense could be reduced, say, one-half the department's estimate, the saving would be about $9,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator, and I ask it entirely for information, whether the States of the South have, to any considerable extent, made appropriations for the betterment of the roads in that section of the country?

Mr. SIMMONS. The States, as such?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The States, as such, have not to any considerable extent, but the counties and municipalities have largely. For instance, just a few days ago one county—Iredell—in my State voted a bond issue of $400,000 for good roads, and within the last few years quite a number of other counties have voted almost as large amounts for this purpose. The State of North Carolina, however, has appropriated a small sum to be expended under the State geologist for advice and engineering assistance to counties constructing roads.

Mr. GALLINGER. That amounts to the same thing practically.

Mr. SIMMONS. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I have long believed——

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator that all over the South this is the question of paramount interest to the people——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And they are responding to it by bond issues that a few years ago would have appalled them. They now vote them readily.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I have long been of opinion that the Federal Government might well cooperate in the betterment of our roads, and I think at one time I introduced a bill in the Senate touching that matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. In our section of the country, somewhat despairing of Federal assistance, we have been making very large appropriations from the State treasury for that purpose. Massachusetts has spent a great many millions. New Hampshire, which is a small State, voted two years ago a million dollars, and I think we have spent probably a million and a half dollars for that purpose, and I was merely wondering whether that spirit of advancement had taken possession of the South, as I thought likely it had. To my mind it makes no difference whether the counties or the municipalities vote this money, or the State appropriates it directly from the State treasury.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not make one particle of difference.

Mr. GALLINGER. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the statistics show that the amount expended in my State for good roads has increased in the past five years 100 per cent. In 1910 over two millions of bonds and about one million of taxes were expended for this purpose. The amount this year will be much larger.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am pleased to know that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say to the Senators from North Carolina and from New Hampshire that the State of Virginia has inaugurated a system of State aid to roads. In Virginia the convicts work on the roads, the State paying the entire expense—feeding, guarding, and clothing the convicts—the materials and the machinery being furnished by the county. In addition, where the counties can not get convicts from the State the State treasury appropriates $250,000 a year on condition that the counties or localities furnish an equal amount.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from North Carolina whether in their States there is good road material available or whether they have to send——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to discuss that a little later.

Mr. SWANSON. As far as Virginia is concerned, we have experimented. In sections of Virginia we have been able to construct very fine roads equal to macadam roads, at an expense of $1,000 or $1,200 a mile.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is costing us, I will say to the Senator, for what we think is a better type of road, about $5,000 a mile.

Mr. SWANSON. That is, a macadam road?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; very thoroughly constructed.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the level section of my State, where I live, roads can be constructed at a cost of about $300 to $500 a mile.

Mr. SWANSON. May I state to the Senator from New Hampshire, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, that by the adoption in Virginia of this system of State aid to roads we have had one of the most wonderful developments of State roads there that any State possesses. We have built in the last four years about 600 miles of macadam road. In addition to that, the counties have issued in the last few years bonds in order to get State aid. The county had to furnish an equal amount, had to furnish material in order to get convicts, had to furnish money in order to get the aid the State gave; and I will state, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have the Senator from Virginia elaborate it.

Mr. SWANSON. That has produced such a movement in Virginia, from one end of the State to the other, that I am satisfied that if the Federal Government will make an appropriation of money for road improvements conditioned on an equal amount being furnished by the State or local authorities, with joint supervision, joint action, joint building, joint agreement on where the road shall be placed, like they do in all the States where they have State aid, it would produce a great and wonderful improvement, and we would have the same experience in the United States; the local authorities, in order to get State aid, would furnish five or six times as much as is furnished by the State.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from Virginia how long since the system of using convicts to construct roads was initiated in his State?

Mr. SWANSON. We commenced about five years ago.

Mr. WARREN. It is entirely satisfactory?

Mr. SWANSON. It is satisfactory. Theretofore our convicts had been worked in the penitentiary under contract, making shoes. About five years ago we passed a law providing that all convicts whose terms do not exceed five years in the penitentiary and all jail prisoners shall be compelled to work on the public roads.

I wish to say in this connection it has not only been satisfactory as a paying investment—road improvement—but it has been extremely beneficial to the health and morals of the convicts themselves.

Mr. WARREN. I should like, as the subject is very interesting to me, because as I understand it the legislature of the State which I have the honor to represent in part in this Chamber has just authorized the employment of convicts for road making, to have it still further elaborated. As I understand the Senator, the State works these convicts on the State roads, laying out various State roads, to which the counties add their aid in the way of cash, or are State roads distinguished from county roads?

Mr. SWANSON. No. Here is the system in Virginia, and which has been adopted in a great many other States recently. Other States have passed similar laws. Louisiana passed a law shortly after the Virginia law, I think. We started it.

In my inaugural message as governor I recommended it. It passed the first legislature. The system we have there is that convicts are furnished on the application of each county in camps, I believe, of about 50.

Mr. WARREN. Supported and managed by the county?

Mr. SWANSON. No; the State furnishes money enough to guard them, feed them, clothe them.

Mr. WARREN. And keeps control of them?

Mr. SWANSON. And medicine for them. It keeps absolute control of them. So there can be no sickness, no maltreatment, or excessive work. They are inspected by State authorities. The State has a department of health, which sees that these men are kept in a good, healthy condition. The county furnishes the material, the county furnishes the machinery, and it is estimated that in the construction of roads through convicts, the State furnishing the labor, the State pays about 40 per cent of the cost of constructon, and the material and the machinery and other expenses, furnished or provided by the local authorities, amount to about 60 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. Does the State contract in cash through the county's hands or does it contribute sufficient only for the support of the convict force which it throws into use on the road?

Mr. SWANSON. The Virginia law is that counties which get convicts can not participate in the appropriation of cash for road purposes. There are not enough camps to go into every county and treat every section of the county equally fair. The Virginia law provides that counties which do not have convicts get the State aid of $250,000, divided equally among the counties that do not have the convict camps, according to the taxes that they put into the treasury.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand that there are county convicts who are also thus employed?

Mr. SWANSON. The county convicts belong to the State. For instance, the circuit judge or corporation judge is authorized——

Mr. WARREN. To take convicts from the county jail?

Mr. SWANSON. To take convicts from the county jail and put them on the State convict road force.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Virginia will permit me, I will state to the Senator from Wyoming that in North Carolina we have a system which has proved very satisfactory to us, but which is somewhat different from that in Virginia.

Mr. WARREN. I want to hear all that the Senator from North Carolina may say, but the main thing I want from both Senators, if they will be kind enough to give it, is, first, is it of advantage to the State itself; second, to the counties; and, third, and more important, is it to the advantage and the betterment, moral and physical, of the convicts themselves? I assume it must be, from what the Senators have said. I have intense interest in all the Senator from North Carolina has said and may say upon this most interesting subject—good roads; how to build and finance and keep in repair, and so forth, as well as treatment of the convict question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state that the North Carolina system is different from the Virginia system, in that the convicts who work on the public roads in North Carolina are worked by the counties instead of by the State. We have a general law by which any county can organize a convict force. The courts of that county are authorized, upon the conviction of certain offenses, to sentence the convicts to the roads in that county. Surrounding counties that have no convict force are authorized also to send their convicts to the counties which have complied with the law and organized a force. In a large number of counties this system has been adopted, and ample provision has been made for carrying it out, and a large part of the road work in those counties is being done by convicts. The results have been satisfactory. It has greatly advanced the cause of good roads, while the outdoor employment has improved the moral and physical condition of the convicts.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say before the Senator takes his seat, so that he may reply if he wishes, that his subject is a most interesting one, and I have believed that in the sparsely settled new States, where there are very large areas of public lands and where they have never participated in the grant or distribution of the swamp lands, certain of those public lands might properly be placed at the disposal of the State government, to be used in connection with this mode of road building which the Senator has so well described. I say this so that any observation he may wish to make in regard to that feature of it may be included in his remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. The subject mentioned by the Senator from Wyoming is a new one to me, but it is very interesting, and he makes a valuable suggestion.

I know of no better disposition that can be made of those lands. I thank him for the suggestion and would like very much to confer with him on the subject hereafter. But, Mr. President, my remarks have already extended to a much longer time than I had expected. I will resume and finish them.

Mr. President, $300,000,000 may be an overestimate of the actual annual loss to the farmer from bad roads, but the loss on the single crop of cotton shows that the aggregate is sufficiently large to furnish an irresistible argument for action to put a stop to this great national waste.

Admit that it is not practicable to save the total amount estimated, yet it is apparent that a great saving can be made through better roads. As this saving would doubtless be shared by the farmer with the consumer in lessening the price of foodstuffs, both the farmer and consumer would be benefited; they would be enabled to buy more; they would make larger purchases; that would be to the advantage of the tradesman, to the advantage of the manufacturer, and of the transportation companies. There would result a general diffusion of benefits. The saving would not be at the expense of others; it would cheapen the cost of marketing, without entailing any loss to anyone. The saving would inure to the benefit of the farmer, in the first instance; and as it would enable him to sell at a lower cost, in the end the benefit would be shared by the consumer.

The cost of making good roads, while considerable, is small compared with the benefits to be derived. Especially is this true of road construction in the South. In that section, where we have sand and clay convenient, the cost of the sand-clay road is not great; and where these ingredients are mixed in proper proportions, they make a road inferior to none in cheapness and durability. The cost ranges from $350 to $550 per mile. Recently I have contributed largely to the building of a mile of this character of road over a heavy sandy surface at a cost of a little above $300, and it is one of the best roads I have ever seen all the year round.

In many parts of the country sand-clay roads are not practicable; there the gravel or macadam roads will have to be built at a cost ranging, according to climate, altitude, and surface conditions, from $1,500 to $5,000 per mile.

The cost of road construction in these sections will be large, but not prohibitive; besides, as 90 per cent of the travel is over less than 50 per cent of the highways, it will not be necessary to use this expensive material except on the main avenues of travel.

Europe has built macadam roads everywhere. So can we where necessary. It is true distances in proportion to population are greater here than in Europe; but, on the other hand, we are wealthier and our population is rapidly concentrating and thickening.

To subserve the needs of commerce and travel, we have built railroads over hills and mountains and under great rivers, with an outlay always great, sometimes stupendous. Why should we then balk in building these auxiliary arteries? We have reached the stage in our national development where we can not afford to leave anything undone the doing of which will promote the national welfare, and where the object to be promoted is national as well as local the Government should join in the doing of it.

Heretofore the demand on our energies and the local condition of our country life were distinctly against any great effort to improve our highways. The railroads constituting the arteries of commerce had first to be substantially completed.

We have built about 240,000 miles of railroad at a cost of about $14,000,000,000, and our needs in that respect have measurably been satisfied. Population has thickened in the older settled sections, products have multiplied, the use of the local highways have largely increased, and the country has at length reached that stage of development which calls for a like development of our system of public highways.

There has, therefore, come into existence a purpose to have better roads, a purpose responsive to a demand arising from national conditions, and this desire for improvement has led to agitation which has resulted in the formation of associations to promote this desirable object. In perhaps every State there is a State association to press forward this work, and there is a national association with the same object. The purpose of all these associations is to promote legislation for the improvement of highways, to organize local associations, and to stimulate the construction of good roads.

Wherever, as the result of this movement, good roads have been constructed the practical benefits have been immediate and far-reaching.

In 25 selected counties of 12 States in which 40 per cent of the roads had been improved the increase in population in the decade ending 1900 was on an average of 30,000 to the county. In 25 counties in the same States where only 1 per cent of the roads had been improved the population during that period, instead of showing an increase, actually decreased 3,000 to the county. Equally marked has been the effect of road improvement upon land values.

Wherever better highways have been introduced these values have increased in a greater or less degree. This increase is seldom less than 20 per cent, and sometimes as high as 100 per cent. The large increase in the value of the abandoned farms of Massachusetts in recent years has been notable. This increased value has been coincident with the improvement of the roads there, and is, I am advised, largely attributable to that.

Good roads have also brought about better conditions of country life. Not only do they lessen the expense of marketing the crop, but they make country life less irksome. They bring the farm and the town nearer together. Measured by travel the town may be two hours distant on a bad road and only one hour distant on a good road, and in carrying a load to market the farmer may make one or two trips, according to the road.

Last, but by no means least, good roads exert a material influence in promoting or retarding education. In many States provisions are now being made to carry the children to school because of the distance of the schoolhouse, resulting from the consolidation of school districts.

In 5 States which rank highest in good roads the average school attendance was found to be 78 out of every 100, and in 5 States that rank lowest in improved highways the average school attendance was 59 out of every 100.

In short, bad roads tend to isolate rural conditions. They render it more difficult to pass about, impede travel, restrict intercourse, interfere with school attendance and churchgoing, promote illiteracy, and are in many other ways a hindrance to progress.

The value of good roads is fully appreciated.

The need is felt.

Conditions now make their betterment imperative.

The people have at last fully awakened to their advantage.

They are ready to participate in the work.

The situation of the country is favorable to the undertaking.

The rural delivery invests the subject with a peculiar interest to the Government, while the progress and welfare of the country is involved.

Economically, industrially, socially, and in every respect the subject invites action.

The Government should do its part to promote the work.

It is too late to contend that the Government should not lend its aid.

It has already spent millions of dollars on waterways.

It has contributed hundreds of millions to railroads.

It has legislated billions in aid of manufacturing.

As a result, manufacturing and transportation have developed faster than agriculture. They have reached a much higher standard of efficiency and excellence. It is now necessary to foster farm life. Rural development has not kept pace with that of the cities and towns. The conveniences and the advantages of urban life are in great contrast to the disadvantages of life on the farm.

While the advantages of our cities are equal to those found elsewhere the conveniences of country life in Europe are far greater than those found here. The country now needs our attention and our best endeavors to promote its development.

The bill I have introduced appropriates $1,000,000 to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the Postmaster General in the improvement of roads over which rural delivery is or may be established, provided the local authorities shall contribute an equal amount for the improvement of the routes selected.

It provides for an investigation and report to Congress of the best and most economical method of improving roads, the cost of such improvement, what amount thereof the Government should contribute and upon what conditions, including the feasibility of raising money for this purpose through a Federal license tax on automobiles engaged in interstate travel, together with a recommendation of a comprehensive plan of Government cooperation to this end.

It will be seen that, while the appropriation now proposed provides for an initiation of Government aid, the proposition is essentially tentative and experimental and is directed largely to eliciting information to enable Congress to work out a scheme of general application.

It is a mere beginning, cautious indeed, but in line with the policy pursued by the Government in the inauguration of rural and city delivery, irrigation, postal savings banks, parcel post for rural routes, and so forth.

In addition to a direct appropriation for this purpose, when the report and recommendation called for in the bill is made Congress will doubtless give consideration to auxiliary methods of providing funds for promoting the object in view.

I have provided in the bill for a report by the Secretary of Agriculture upon the feasibility of imposing a license tax upon automobiles engaged in interstate traffic for raising funds with which to carry on this work on the part of the Government.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have simply proposed that as a subject for investigation.

Mr. BACON. I wish to make another suggestion in that connection, if the Senator will permit me. I do not know whether his suggestion goes to that extent or not, but I think the license should be graduated according to the speed used by the automobiles in traveling over the roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. I entirely agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. BACON. I am not jesting about it; I am in serious earnest. I think that an automobile which will go through the country in a decent, respectable, quiet style ought to be permitted to do so at a reasonable rate, but one that goes at a speed which makes it dangerous for anybody to be in the neighborhood of the road, to travel on it or to cross it, in my opinion ought to be made to pay a tax which will be sufficient to deter them from any such indulgence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will suggest to the Senator from Georgia in this connection that the danger is not only increased by the speed, but the injury to the road is greatly increased.

Mr. BACON. Certainly; and not only the injury to the road but the dust raised by them makes it unbearable to be anywhere near the road for half an hour afterwards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose to emphasize precisely what the Senator from North Carolina has himself stated, as to the danger from an automobile running at great speed—and they utterly violate the laws of every State when they get on our highways—and also the destruction of the roads which results from the great speed on the part of the automobile. As an illustration I will take our beautiful macadam roads in New England, costing from $5,000 to $6,000 a mile. The surface of them is destroyed in a very short time, and we have got to repair them every year. We have a tar preparation which we are now using that protects them very well. But it is a consideration of vast moment that while the people have been taxed to construct these roads we are permitting a certain class of people, usually in violation of law, to run this great juggernaut over the roads at a rate of speed which destroys them in a very short time. I think they ought to be taxed, and taxed very heavily, and I am glad to say that in our section of the country that matter is receiving very serious attention.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that with a view of getting information upon all these phases of the matter I have provided expressly in the bill I have introduced for an investigation and a report to Congress upon all the phases of the question, and especially upon the feasibility of a national registration and license tax on automobiles engaged in interstate traffic.

The scheme of raising money for this purpose by a Government license tax upon automobiles engaged in interstate travel is an interesting one, and will doubtless receive thorough consideration. A number of States are now raising large sums for this purpose through the medium of a State license tax on these machines.

There are half a million automobiles in the country now, and they will rapidly multiply as road improvement progresses until here, as in Europe, they will in part take the place of the railroads for a certain class of travel.

Estimating that one in every five of these machines will be used in interstate travel—that, I will say, is not quite one-third of the estimate which is made by the department officials with whom I have conferred about this matter—a fee of $10 on machines so used would yield an annual revenue of $1,000,000, without interfering with the license charge imposed by the State. Undoubtedly there are possibilities in the suggestion of a license tax, and its feasibility doubtless will receive consideration from Congress on the coming in of the report, should this present proposition become a law.

If the practical results of this measure, if adopted, are satisfactory, as I am sure they will be, there is no reason to doubt the early adoption by Congress of a comprehensive and well-devised plan of national cooperation which will eventuate in advancing the postal highways of the country to a condition commensurate with the public needs and in keeping with the national standard of progress.

The immediate effects of the adoption of this bill can not fail to be advantageous. It will stimulate interest throughout the country and give shape and direction to the influences now at work for road improvement.

Of course the work will be carried on through the Office of Good Roads of the Department of Agriculture, which has already done so much in arousing public interest and in wisely aiding and directing local efforts.

Up to this time the work of this department has been confined largely to elementary instruction to local road builders, lectures, object lessons in supervision, and advisory work. Under this act the power of the department officials in these respects will be greatly enlarged, while the means will be supplied for experimental work of building short stretches of good roads in the various States of the Union.

The result in actual betterment of roads, while great, will be small compared to the results which will flow from the impetus which will be given to the movement for good roads throughout the country.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall conclude in a moment.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator concludes, I should like to ask him whether in his own State there is any general system of improving highways?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will wait until I have finished my sentence, I shall be glad to answer, as I am closing.

Mr. WORKS. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Manifestly the time is ripe for the Government to enter upon this cooperative work. The conditions are similar to those conditions in agriculture which led the department to engage in experimental farm work—a step forward which has proved a great advantage to the farming interests. It would be difficult to overestimate the beneficial results of this experimental farm work. Some of them have been surprising. The leaven of improved methods is working, and its effects are manifested in increased production, in greater diversification of crops, and in enlarged profits. The whole country and all the people are the beneficiaries.

Shall the Government, having so auspiciously started upon the work of reclaiming the great and honorable calling of agriculture from the drudgery to which conditions had condemned it, now halt and hesitate to do the one thing needful to restore it to its rightful position of primacy among the great industries of the Nation? I hope not, I think not, and I had almost said I know it will not.

Now, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether in his own State there is any general system of constructing and improving the highways as State highways?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that there is no general system in my State of State highways, but there is now on foot, recently inaugurated and over which the people have become very much worked up, a great scheme to build a central highway from the sea to the mountains. That road will pass through about 25 counties, and its length will be between 450 and 500 miles. The present plan is for that road to be built by the counties through which it passes. While there has been no State appropriation for the improvement of State highways, we have legislation which provides for a county system which any county can adopt. Many of the counties have taken up this subject with great vigor, and, as I have stated, probably in the absence of the Senator from California, are imposing taxes and issuing bonds for that purpose. There are a number of counties in my State that have issued bonds in amounts from three to four hundred thousand dollars at one time for the improvement of the roads in those counties.

I mentioned a little while ago one county which only a few days ago, within the last month, I think—not one of the largest or richest counties, but a progressive county—voted $400,000 in bonds at one time for road improvement. That is going on all over the State. I should say that one-third in number of the counties, comprising about one-half of the State, have issued bonds, or are now preparing to issue bonds, for that purpose, while many of the other counties are doing the same work by current taxation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I ask these questions because, under the provisions contained in this bill, the cooperation which is provided for would necessarily have to be with the local authorities in each county where there is no general system under the control of the State.

This is a question in which the people of my State are very deeply interested. We have very lately voted bonds to the amount of $18,000,000 for the purpose of constructing State highways throughout the State. In my own county we have voted $3,500,000 in bonds for the purpose of bettering the roads in our county. That feeling is spreading all over the State of California, and naturally I am interested in any movement of that sort which is likely to bring results. I was only undertaking to find out as nearly as I could what would be the probable effect of the provision by which the officers of the National Government are authorized to cooperate with the State authorities in undertaking to improve the condition of the highways in the different States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very happy to have the information the Senator gives in reference to the work of constructing and improving roads in his State. The bill I have introduced appropriating a million dollars for experimental work on rural routes to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the Postmaster General, specifically provides:

That the State or the local subdivision thereof in which such improvement is made under this provision shall furnish an equal amount of money for the improvement of the road or roads so selected.

So that it would be a matter of adjustment by the Secretary of Agriculture with the local authorities or the State, as the case might be.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill upon which I have submitted these remarks be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2846) for experimental improvement of rural delivery roads by the Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the Postmaster General, for investigating the subject of Federal registration and license of automobiles used in interstate travel, and for other purposes, introduced by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $1,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the Postmaster General in improving the conditions of roads to be selected by them over which rural delivery is or may hereafter be established, such improvement to be for the purpose of ascertaining the increase in the territory which could be served by each carrier as a result of such improvement, the possible increase of the number of delivery days in each year, the amount required in excess of local expenditures for the proper maintenance of such roads, and the relative saving to the Government in the operation of the rural delivery service, and to the local inhabitants in the transportation of their products by reason of such improvement: Provided, That the State or the local subdivision thereof in which such improvement is made under this provision shall furnish an equal amount of money for the improvement of the road or roads so selected. Such improvement shall be made under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General are hereby directed to report to Congress within one year after the ratification of this act the result of their operations under this act, the number of miles of road improved, the cost of same, and the feasibility and desirability of a Federal license tax on automobiles engaged in interstate travel, and such other information as they may have acquired in connection with the operation of this act, together with such recommendations as shall seem wise for providing a general plan of national aid for the improvement of postal roads in cooperation with the States and counties, and to bring about as near as possible such cooperation among the various States as will insure uniform and equitable interstate highway regulations, and for providing necessary funds for carrying out such plans of national aid, if it shall be deemed feasible to provide the same or any part thereof otherwise than by appropriation from the Treasury for that purpose.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate shall vote on what is known as the Root amendment to the pending bill before adjournment on Monday next. I do that because the Senator from New York wants to leave town, and I do not think there will be any objection to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a vote be taken upon the so-called Root amendment to the pending bill before adjournment on Monday next. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN APPROPRIATION ACTS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts, approved March 4, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, it is proposed to strike out from line 7 to line 24, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert:

So much of the naval appropriation act, approved March 4, 1911, as authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payments under public contracts, is amended by omitting the words "ninety per centum of," so that the proviso will read as follows: "And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to make partial payments from time to time during the progress of the work under existing contracts and all contracts hereafter made under the Navy Department for public purposes, but not in excess of the value of the work already done; and the contracts hereafter made shall provide for such insurance as the Secretary of the Navy may deem sufficient, and for a lien in favor of the Government, which lien is hereby made paramount to all other liens, upon the articles or thing contracted for on account of all payments so made; provided that partial payments shall not be made under such contracts except where stipulated for, and then only in accordance with contract provisions."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the amendment be explained.

Mr. WARREN. I am going to explain it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to understand if the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is not to reenact a provision with reference to the last naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was about to say that since the committee reported this joint resolution a bill has passed the Senate which provides for the purpose the amendment has in view, and another bill carrying, among other things, a similar provision has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Naval Affairs. I think it is admitted on both sides that the provision is a proper one. Certainly it is urgently requested on the part of the Navy Department that it ought to be a part of this measure, which seeks to amend the last naval appropriation act.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I would not be frank if I did not state to the Senator in charge of the bill that an amendment as important as that can not pass with only a few Senators present.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. This amendment is precisely the same as the bill introduced by the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which passed the Senate and which has been, as I understand, favorably reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives; but for some reason or other it has not made progress in the House. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy in a communication addressed to the Senator from California, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which is embodied in the report on the bill which the Senate passed and is to be found in report No. 28, Sixty-second Congress, first session.

The matter is somewhat complicated, but it has been carefully examined by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and by other members of the committee. It has already passed the Senate and is to-day on the calendar of the House. It is intended to cure some legal complications which have arisen inadvertently. If the Senator desires me to go on and explain the matter, I will do so; but I assure him it is all right.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	Overman	Smoot
Bailey	Cullom	Owen	Stone
Borah	Cummins	Page	Sutherland
Bourne	Foster	Penrose	Swanson
Bradley	Gallinger	Perkins	Taylor
Bristow	Heyburn	Poindexter	Thornton
Brown	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Townsend
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Reed	Warren
Burnham	Kern	Root	Watson
Burton	La Follette	Shively	Wetmore
Chamberlain	McCumber	Simmons	Williams
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Crawford	Newlands	Smith, S. C.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I was requested this morning by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] to say, in the event of a roll call, that he was engaged in his duties as a member of the committee now having under investigation the Lorimer case.

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is in attendance upon the hearings being conducted by the committee having under consideration the Lorimer case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is unavoidably detained from the Senate as a member of the committee investigating the Lorimer case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. PENROSE. I am informed, and I believe correctly, that the provision of the naval appropriation act, which this amendment is intended to correct, was dropped out in conference at the closing hours of the last session, and inadvertently retained in transcribing the bill by the enrolling clerks.

It also maintains simply the law as administered heretofore until certain old statutes had attention called to them, and some question was raised as to the right of the Navy Department to contract as heretofore.

I ask the clerk to read the letter to the chairman of the Naval Committee, the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], which is embodied in the communication addressed to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 1, 1911.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to invite your attention to my letter of the 3d of February last requesting that a provision be inserted in the naval bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payments not in excess of the value of the work already done under public contracts, and stating the reasons on which such request was based.

The provision relating to such partial payments contained in the bill as passed, which is said to have been included by clerical error and which it is proposed to repeal by joint resolution No. 1, now before the Senate, authorizes, as you are aware, payments up to only 90 per cent of the value of the work already done.

If said provision should remain unrepealed and unamended, the stipulations in certain existing contracts would be violated and this department would probably be exposed to suits for damages, whether the claims were valid or not, on account of the withholding of 10 per cent of the amounts promised to be paid. If it should be repealed and nothing substituted in its place, the department might, it is assumed, in accordance with what is understood to be the construction the accounting officers place upon the existing law, be forbidden to make any payments under said existing contracts, and the contractors, being thereby subjected to more extensive losses than in the other event, would have greater reason for claiming damages from the Government.

Should the department not be authorized to make partial payments under future contracts in any amount, or if payments were restricted to 90 per cent of the value of the work done, the Government would, obviously, be obliged to pay as part of the contract price in each case the whole cost or a part of the cost of financing the work. For the vessels last authorized the cost of withholding 10 per cent of the contract price, made up of sums ranging from $3,000 for each $500,000 submarine boat to $50,000 for a $6,000,000 battleship, would amount to approximately $100,000 in excess of their cost under the previous plan of making partial payments. For these burdens no compensating advantage would be derived by the Government.

The precautions and safeguards provided by the department's contracts for the protection of the public interests are comprehensive, and would seem to make unnecessary and disadvantageous to the Government the withholding of the entire contract price or of a percentage of partial payments until the completion of the work. Indeed, it is probable that none of the shipbuilding companies could finance the building of $6,000,000 vessels, such as have recently been undertaken and are likely to be authorized in the future.

In view of the foregoing it is urgently recommended that enactment be secured authorizing the department to make partial payments under its public contracts not in excess of the value of the work already done.

Inclosed herewith is a draft of a provision that would, it is believed, in case of the passage of the joint resolution mentioned above, be adequate for the purpose, wherein, as will be observed, the Government's interests are to be protected by insurance and by a lien that is made paramount. If the provision in the naval act of March 4 be not repealed, an amendment thereof to give the department the discretion as to payments granted by the inclosed draft is earnestly desired.

The provisions of the accompanying draft are the same as those of the draft transmitted with the department's letter of the 3d of February mentioned above.

Faithfully, yours, GEO. VON L. MEYER.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I think, under the circumstances, some explanation should be made of the present condition of this joint resolution.

It came over from the House in its original form and went to the Committee on Appropriations. There was a contention about this naval matter, and the proposition then made to the committee was different from the one now made. The committee rejected that and reported the joint resolution exactly as it came from the House, except as to recommendations regarding preamble and title.

The Navy Department has made contracts for large battleships, which were duly signed, and carried the promise of the Government to pay, as fast as the work proceeds, the value of the work in place. This has been the custom for years. But this 90 per cent clause that was included—and, as it seems, erroneously included in the naval appropriation act—called attention to the fact of partial payments and caused the matter to go before the Department of Justice, and its report is that it requires some legislation to enable the work to be done and the Government to make the advance payments as per contracts.

Now, in the manner in which it is presented here, this amendment puts it back exactly where it was before any legislation was attempted. It puts it where the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, may pay as contracted for on these vessels, not exceeding the actual cost of the work in place.

If that proves to be wrong, of course we should remedy it hereafter. The question comes whether we want to abrogate the contracts already made, and whether we are taking any undue risk in permitting those contracts to be carried out according to their terms.

Now, the condition of legislation with respect to this shipbuilding left things in such shape that the Senate—and I regret to say I was away at the time—took the matter up, and passed substantially this legislation that is now proposed here as an independent measure, and, as I understand after inquiry, without opposition. It went to the House, and the House committee has reported a similar House measure favorably, and it is now on the House calendar.

Of course we can not talk here much about the action of the House, but my information is that it is for the best interests of the Government to allow this amendment to go in, and send the measure to conference. Of course in conference the House will have its conferees and the matter can be adjusted satisfactorily to both bodies.

While I was opposed originally to amending this joint resolution in committee, and while I think I would be opposed now to the same proposition that came then, yet as it comes now—and there has been no opportunity and, perhaps, no reason why it should be taken to the Appropriations Committee—I have been willing to accept the amendment and to let it go to conference.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, this joint resolution, as it came from the House of Representatives, was properly sent to the Committee on Appropriations. I happen to be a member of that committee, and was present at the meeting which considered the joint resolution, and at which it was decided not to adopt the suggestion which is now before the Senate, but to report favorably the joint resolution as it passed the House of Representatives without amendment, which was merely to correct—that is the substance of it, although the effect would be that of a law—an erroneous enrollment of the bill.

Now, the proposed amendment has never been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which has this matter in charge, so far as I have any information, and it never has been considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. On that point, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has in charge the appropriation for the Naval Department.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that.

Mr. PENROSE. And it has been favorably reported. And also, Mr. President, the joint resolution is to correct an error in enrollment, because I think the records will prove conclusively that the enrolling clerks failed to copy the bill correctly as agreed on by the conferees, and this provision was dropped out. I do not think there is any dispute about it.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Committee on Naval Affairs had anything at all to do with this amendment, it ought to have been considered by it and then referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which has charge of the joint resolution. But nothing of that kind has been done, so far as I have any information, and the amendment which is proposed has been offered on the floor and has never been printed, and I for one have not had an opportunity to examine it.

I suggest, Mr. President, that the proposed amendment be again reported, to see what it really is, before the Senate attempts to act on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 strike out lines 7 to 24, both inclusive, and insert:

So much of the naval appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, as authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payment under public contracts, is amended by omitting the words "90 per cent of," so that the proviso will read as follows: "And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to make partial payments from time to time during the progress of the work under existing contracts and all contracts hereafter made under the Navy Department for public purposes, but not in excess of the value of work already done; and the contracts hereafter made shall provide for such insurance as the Secretary of the Navy may deem sufficient, and for a lien in favor of the Government, which lien is hereby made paramount to all other liens, upon the articles or thing contracted for on account of all payments so made; provided that partial payments shall not be made under such contracts except where stipulated for, and then only in accordance with contract provisions."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs when the provision which is in controversy was inserted in the naval appropriation act. It was thought at that time desirable to make that change, but it was afterwards ascertained that it probably would not work to the advantage of the Government, and it undoubtedly was dropped out in conference. I do not think there is any serious question as to that.

Mr. President, this is distinctively and clearly a matter for the Naval Committee to determine, rather than the Committee on Appropriations. It relates to an appropriation for the Navy or a provision relating to the Navy, and it has been submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs and reported back favorably; and I do not think it would either expedite the matter or lead to any better legislation if we held it up and referred it to the Committee on Appropriations.

I feel very sure that the provision is a wise one. No harm has come to the Government from a system that prevailed before this attempted amendment was engaged in, and if we agree to the amendment, which has been submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], we simply restore the matter to the condition it has been in for a great many years and concerning which there has been, so far as I know, no serious complaint.

I trust, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] will not insist upon sending this to the Committee on Appropriations, but will permit the amendment to be agreed to, so that we may get this troublesome question off our hands.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, my only purpose was to call attention to the irregularity, as I conceive it to be, in presenting this amendment, and also to invite attention to the fact that the effect of it will be to override the policy suggested in the House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER. The measure will go to conference at any rate, and then it can be determined whether the House will insist. If the House insists upon this joint resolution as it came to this body, then, of course, the Senate will not have power to make the change.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is made to appear very clearly by the communication from the Secretary of the Navy that under the existing law if this amendment is not adopted or some amendment made to existing law the Navy Department will be very much embarrassed, not only in reference to making contracts, but in carrying out contracts already made. It is found that the auditing officers of the Treasury Department are unwilling to approve vouchers for partial payments on contracts which the Navy Department has made for construction work for the Navy, such as battleships and other vessels.

Mr. PENROSE. For 50 years——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. For 50 years, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says; for a long time, I know, the department has been in the habit of making these advances, but some confusion is found in the legislation enacted in the closing hours of the last session, and as the law now stands the Navy Department finds itself unable to protect the public interest as it should be protected. Indeed, the Secretary of the Navy says that unless some legislation is passed he contemplates suits against the United States Government for not complying with the contracts it has already entered into.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the pending joint resolution may be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Under those conditions an amendment to this joint resolution, which passed the House and came over here, has been offered on the floor of the Senate, which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] thinks is somewhat irregular. It is not the best practice, of course, for important amendments to be acted upon by the Senate before they have been considered by a committee, but it is an everyday practice. Any Senator has a right to offer an amendment to a pending bill. When a bill has been reported from a committee, it is before the Senate and is open to amendment.

The Senator from Pennsylvania offered an amendment, and it is a plain and simple one. It simply provides for advances to be made by the Navy Department on account of work being done under a contract with the Navy Department. It is work that is being done for the Government, and this authority to make advances is protected and hedged about in the safest possible manner. In the first instance, the contractors are required to give bond or security. In the next place, before the advances are made, he is required to insure the ship that is in progress of construction for the protection of the Government. In addition to that insurance, the amendment gives to the Government a lease paramount to all other leases on the vessel being constructed. There is no possibility, in other words, that the Government can lose anything if the amendment is passed. It is absolutely certain that the Government will lose something if the amendment is not passed, because the Secretary of the Navy says that he contemplates that in the present uncertain state of the law the Government will be sued for damages if some relief is not given.

So far as my investigation of the subject goes, and it has been carefully and thoroughly made, I have not a particle of doubt on the subject. I feel that this legislation is safe and necessary and urgent, that it ought to be passed, and passed at once.

REDUCTION OF MILITARY EXPENSES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I have little familiarity with the subject, but my attention was attracted by a joint resolution in which it is proposed to reduce the appropriations for the next fiscal year various sums aggregating nearly $400,000. As I have been greatly interested in urging that at this extra session we should take action regarding the reduction of the military appropriations of the Government for the Army and the Navy for the ensuing fiscal year from about $230,000,000 to $200,000,000, I have been greatly gratified to observe that by the joint action of both Houses it is now proposed to reduce those expenditures at least $400,000 through the items inserted in this joint resolution.

In pursuit of the general inquiry as to this movement to reduce the expenditures of the Government during the next fiscal year, a movement which I regard as essential, in view of a possible reduction of the revenue through tariff revision, I would like to ask the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether any other bills or resolutions are pending which have passed the House of Representatives looking to a reduction of appropriations already made for the expenditures of the Government during the next fiscal year?

Mr. WARREN. The joint resolution carries a reduction of between $300,000 and $400,000 because of errors in enrollment in the appropriation bills of the last Congress. It is not really a reduction of what Congress intended to appropriate.

Now, as to reductions sought other than these to be made from standing appropriations, I have no knowledge of an official nature that any act has ever been proposed. We have nothing before the Committee on Appropriations of that nature, excepting one, and that is a joint resolution which came from the Committee on Accounts of the other House and which proposes to cut off some 35 or 45 per cent of the police force of the Capitol Building. That is the only other measure of the kind that I know of.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I greatly regret to hear the statement of the Senator from Wyoming. I entertained the hope as I read this resolution that it meant a real effort on the part of Congress, initiated in the House of Representatives, to reduce the appropriations for the next fiscal year. We all know that, outside of the appropriations for the Post Office Department, the annual appropriations reach pretty nearly $800,000,000, and of that sum one-half is expended either in taking care of those who have fought in the wars that have passed and their dependents or in providing for the wars of the future.

NEED OF CONSTRUCTIVE WORK.

I think there is a growing impatience in the country regarding these vast military expenditures. It is the belief of the people of the country that a very large portion of this vast sum could be better expended in great constructive works, such as public buildings throughout the country, upon which at least $30,000,000 annually should be spent, and the development of our rivers through cooperation with the States, upon which at least $50,000,000 more should be annually expended.

We must provide for these great constructive works demanded by the country, either by a reduction of military expenditures or by increased taxes. So far as increased taxes are concerned, in the absence of constitutional authority for an income tax, we will have to rely upon an increase of the corporation tax, which, through a graduated system of increase, can be made productive of increased revenue through taxation imposed upon great industrial organizations known as trusts, organizations which, under our protective system, are privileged to levy heavy taxes upon the people and which therefore should all the more readily contribute to the burdens of government.

But we ought to make an effort, it seems to me, at this session to cut down the appropriations for the next year already authorized by Congress. I believe that if we would organize a board in each one of these departments, acting under the direction of the President, which would bring the chiefs of the various services into cooperation and authorize and direct them to reduce these appropriations from $230,000,000 down to $200,000,000, giving them a comparatively free hand as to the items which should be reduced, we would have at the end just as efficient a service with a lessened expenditure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The present fiscal year will terminate in about eight days. The appropriations that were made were for the next fiscal year, and doubtless the departments have made arrangements and contracts. The Senator would hardly break into those contracts made for the next year and reduce them arbitrarily? Would not the Senator's efforts be more wisely directed if they should be made to operate as to the appropriations which will be made in the future, and not undertake to interrupt those that have been made after due consideration and recommendation from the departments, and upon which the departments have doubtless made their plans for the next fiscal year?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am anxious to act in both ways. I would not, of course, act in such a way as to violate any contracts which had been made by the Government. I would not, of course, act in such a way as would seriously disturb the administration of the War Department or of the Navy Department, but I do believe that authority can wisely be given to the President, with the aid of such a board, to largely reduce the military expenditure, and that if the chiefs of the various services are called into cooperation with a view to making reductions in administration, reductions in construction, large savings will be made.

A FREER HAND SHOULD BE GIVEN THE DEPARTMENTS.

I believe, Mr. President, we have not been accustomed to give the departments a sufficiently free hand in the administration of the funds intrusted to them. Congress has been so jealous of its powers that it has sought to the last detail to prescribe the items of every proposed expenditure. It has been the custom of Congress practically to put the departments in a strait-jacket, so that the organizing power, the administrative capacity, and the constructive capacity of the intelligent officials connected with those services have not been brought into play in their full scope.

We all know how in the great corporations this system of cooperation between the various services, of comparative accounts, of frequent consultations, is accomplished, and how it results in the present perfected system of economic administration which has given the great corporations such high industrial and business efficiency.

My observation is that we have in the military and naval service of the country and in the civil service of the country men of the highest capacity, men capable of dealing with the most important of problems and of works, men animated by high standards of integrity, men who are proud of the fact that they are in the Government service, and who give that service their best effort, even though their service in other directions might result in large personal fortunes. I do not underrate at all the capacity of the civil service of the United States or the capacity of our Army or Navy officers. I think their capacity is of the highest standard. But we have not made it as efficient as we could by giving them a freer hand in the administration within the limits of the appropriation made by Congress.

IMPORTANCE OF BUDGET COMMITTEE.

I believe it is a much wiser view of this whole question for Congress to take, in the first instance, through a committee such as the Committee on Public Expenditures, which was authorized by the last Congress and abandoned in this, a full survey of all the operations of the Government, to ascertain the requirements of the various departments and services, and then to adjust the proposed appropriations to the requirements in such a way as to bring all within the limits of the revenue to be obtained, and to see to it that this vast income is not entirely spent in administration, which is a thing of the hour, but that a large portion of it is spent in great constructive work that will have enduring value to the Nation.

We need such a committee, a committee that will bring in cooperation the chairmen of the various appropriating committees of the Senate, and which will take a broad and general view of the situation that would result in a limitation of appropriations to each department and service, but not a limitation in such elaborate detail as to tie the hands of those who administer the fund and prevent them from expending that fund in such a way as to secure the highest results both in administration and construction.

Mr. President, we have a long time before us at this session, and I take advantage of this opportunity to urge upon the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that something be done at the present session to revive the Committee on Public Expenditures or to call into being a committee of similar duties, so that it can enter scientifically and comprehensively upon this question, adjusting the expenditures of the country to the revenues of the country in such a way as to take care of both administration and construction, and not let the great constructive work of the country be neglected as it has been for years past.

I regret to see that the pending joint resolution is not upon the lines which I first thought it was built upon, namely, an effort to practically reduce by joint resolution of Congress appropriations already made. Whilst it has that effect, whilst it practically reduces the appropriations $400,000, yet the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations assures me that it only corrects errors in the enrollment of the bills at the last session and is not passed in pursuance of an earnest intention to reduce the expenditures of the Government and to restore a needed economy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend the joint resolution on page 2 by striking out lines 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 strike out lines 12 to 16, inclusive, in the following words:

So much of the general deficiency appropriation act approved March 4, 1911, as appropriates the sum of $500 to reimburse the State board of regents of the University of Idaho for the premium paid on an indemnity bond is repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Appropriations have reported an amendment to strike out the preamble. Without objection, the preamble is stricken out.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to amend certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911."

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, for many years various efforts have been made to establish a department of health of the United States, and during the last year both Houses of Congress have been considering this question, and the most overwhelming evidence has been submitted in the Senate and House hearings justifying the establishment of such department. There has arisen in opposition to the department of health an organized movement resisting the establishment of the department, under a so-called League of Medical Freedom, on the alleged ground that it would promote one school of medicine over another school of medicine and invade the rights of the States and of individual citizens.

I introduced at the beginning of the present session Senate bill No. 1, providing for the establishment of a department of health, which did not place the head of that department in the Cabinet, but which expressly provided against any possible invasion of State or of individual rights and against any discrimination for or against any so-called system or school of medicine.

Mr. President, I am entirely opposed to promoting one school of medicine over another school of medicine. My purpose in urging a department of public health has been to establish a department of human conservation—educational rather than regulative—which should deal with the matter from an educational standpoint, so as to make effective and efficient the knowledge which we are slowly acquiring with regard to the preservation of human life.

And the preservation of human life does not deal primarily with the curing of a man after he is desperately sick. It should not be regarded as a science devoted to the cure of bubonic plague after bubonic plague has been established in the human organism. It should not deal with the question of tuberculosis after it has been contracted, but it should deal with this terrible disease by preventive means. The important point is to prevent it—not to merely cure it. These diseases are easy to prevent, but almost impossible to cure.

A department of human conservation—called, for convenience, a department of health—would naturally deal with instructing the people of the United States in well-ascertained facts with regard to sanitary engineering, sanitary construction of streets, alleys, houses, sewerage, water supply, milk supply, and food supplies generally; proper care of the markets, the control of insect life, which is so frequently the cause of disease, as in the cases of the malaria and yellow-fever mosquito; the extermination of the house fly, with its typhoid-fever germ; and the education of the people, through circulars, authoritative publications, through the schools, and through special instructors on the rules of right living.

The instruction of the people as to the value of fresh air, clean air, clean bodies, the proper use of the bath and hot and cold water, and the proper precautions to guard against infectious diseases. It would disseminate full and complete knowledge relative to diseases of sex now prevalent throughout the United States and throughout the world by reason of the gross ignorance of young people arriving at the age of puberty with no knowledge whatever upon this vital topic and thus exposed by gross ignorance to the most dangerous maladies.

These things, and much other interesting information, which, under proper guidance, could be made the common knowledge and the common property of the people of the United States, operating through the municipal, State, and Federal agencies, within their strict constitutional limitations, are of vital importance to the people of the United States, to their health and longevity and to their happiness; to their physical, mental, and moral well-being. Our insane asylums are full of syphilitics. Our blind institutions are filled in like manner through venereal diseases. Our cities are filled with tuberculosis victims carrying disease of the most malignant character into the houses of the rich and the poor, especially the poor.

I desire the country to understand that the purpose of the department of health is in reality that of race conservation, the preservation of human life and of human energy, and that there is great need for the cooperation of all classes of men, including the Christian Scientists, who have undoubtedly been of genuine public service in teaching people better methods of self-control. This is also true with regard to the school of osteopathy, as well as other so-called schools of medicine, chief of which are the so-called regular physicians, sometimes called allopaths and homeopaths.

We need prevention more than cure, however. We have not so much the need for the regular physician, as his function is generally understood—that is, as a man who will give medicine to cure a sick patient, as we have need for his services, and for the services of all schools of medicine, in their far more important aspect of preventing diseases by instructing patients, whether sick or well, in the rules of right living.

This, indeed, is the great work which has been done by the regular physician, and which has been done likewise by other schools of medicine not known as regulars and by men who were not physicians at all. The great Pasteur was a chemist, not a physician. Dr. Wylie is a food expert, not a medical practitioner. It seems to me that all good men who desire the welfare of the human race should be favorable to the establishment of a department of public health, which shall not give special preferment to any school of medicine or system of medicine, but which shall devote itself to the conservation of the human race, and which shall study with care and with patience all claims of all schools of men engaged in the art of healing, in the more important art of preventing disease and ill health. This will include osteopaths, Christian Scientists, physical culturists, and a great variety of students of human health.

I have drawn Senate bill No. 1 in such a way that the proposed department is not permitted to discriminate in favor of any school or system of medicine; so that it shall not invade any function of any State; so that it shall not enter the house of any individual without his free consent and invitation.

The real function of a department of public health is to prevent disease. The cure of diseases should not comprise one-twentieth part of the activities of such a department. What we want is to prevent people being made sick, not merely to attempt to cure them when they are ready for the grave.

In this connection I call attention to a very important department established by the Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York, a description of which appears in the New York Commercial. William A. Day, president of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, has just announced the organization of a "conservation department," with Elmer E. Rittenhouse, former president of the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society, at its head. It proposes to circularize the millions of men who hold policies in that assurance society on the gentle art of self-care as a means of the preservation of their own health, the care of the health of their families, their households, and they expect to use this system as a practical money-making proposition, because, having assured the life of their policy holders, they want to prolong their lives as much as possible.

The New York Commercial, of June 17, 1911, makes the following announcement:

[New York Commercial, June 17, 1911.]

"EQUITABLE ESTABLISHES CONSERVATION DEPARTMENT—ELMER E. RITTENHOUSE TO BE COMMISSIONER IN CHARGE—PURPOSE OF NEW BUREAU WILL BE TO CONSERVE HEALTH AND LIVES OF POLICY HOLDERS AND PREVENT LAPSES—EDUCATIONAL AND SANITARY CAMPAIGN PLANNED.

"William A. Day, president of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, yesterday announced the inauguration of a 'conservation department,' with Elmer E. Rittenhouse, former president of the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society, at its head. Mr. Rittenhouse will be known as the 'conservation commissioner.'

"The purpose of the new department is to carry into effect one of the new ideas in life insurance, that of conserving the health and lives of present policy holders and preventing lapses. Mr. Rittenhouse attracted wide attention in his former connection by instituting a campaign of medical assistance for policy holders, and recently the Association of Life Insurance Presidents started a health conservation bureau.

"At a meeting this week of the association one of the members reported the results of an inspection he had made of the sanitary conditions of 32 cities of the country, and he suggested the organization of local sanitary clubs.

"The Equitable, however has gone into the matter more extensively. The announcement setting forth the news of the new appointment says:

"All life insurance companies suffer from two sources of waste or loss, which have been given much study and which continue to cost the policy holders large sums annually. One is the annual loss of life from preventable or postponable cause. The other is the loss due to the costly American habit of lapsing policies.

"The life companies of the country lost from this source last year over $700,000,000 of insurance already on their books, which cost the policy holders of the United States over $20,000,000 to put on the books. Over 26,000,000 policy holders are therefore personally and financially interested in the reduction of the loss from both these causes.

"The society will assist its members by educational and perhaps other methods to reduce life waste. It will also extend such help as it legally may to the public-health authorities of the country in their efforts to improve sanitary and general health conditions. It will give its moral support to the general life-conservation movement which has reached nation-wide proportions and already accomplished much in favorably affecting the mortality rate of the country.

"This phase of the 'efficiency problem' will be given especial attention and the measures adopted to favorably affect it will be made known as the work develops.

"It is believed that before the end of another five years every life insurance company of consequence will have a department designed not only to conserve business, but to lower mortality. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., of this city, has had great success in its industrial field with its nursing service and the wide distribution of literature setting forth measures to prevent tuberculosis.

"The Equitable, however, will go further than this, according to present plans. It will use its agents and medical men all over the country to cooperate with the local health boards for the purpose of improving sanitary conditions, and it will use the 'conservation department' for the purpose of getting into close touch with individual policy holders."

I respectfully submit an answer to President Huntington, of the Connecticut General Insurance Co., by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, president of the Committee of One Hundred on National Health, on the more obvious benefits a department of health would have over the present Marine-Hospital Bureau:

460 PROSPECT STREET, April 21, 1911.

President ROBERT W. HUNTINGTON, Jr.,
Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn.

DEAR SIR: Senator OWEN has written me that you have inquired of him as to the functions which a new national department of health could profitably assume which are not already sufficiently covered by the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and the other bureaus of the United States Government.

I think one of the best arguments in favor of such a department is contained in the speech of Senator OWEN himself, which I am therefore sending you under a separate cover. You will notice that his argument shows the utter inadequacy in times of stress of a bureau like the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service under a department the head of which usually does not know and does not care in regard to public health and whose interests, even, are sometimes directly opposed. Except in the life insurance business and some others there is, at least as my studies have led me to believe, a very common conflict between commercial interests and public-health interests. It was for this reason that the yellow fever was systematically concealed in Southern States for fear that its presence would interfere with trade, and it was only as the States there finally appealed to the United States Government to take over the quarantine stations that the intolerable situation by which each locality denied the existence of yellow fever, while accusing the neighboring States of having it, was done away with.

The San Francisco episode is one which Senator OWEN emphasizes. He does not overdraw the situation in the least, as I known by information direct from Dr. John S. Fulton and Dr. J. J. Kinyoun, who were directly concerned, and the former of whom made a special investigation. A number of representatives of San Francisco commercial interests were sent to Washington to prevent the knowledge of the bubonic plague's existence in San Francisco from being spread by the United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and they would have succeeded had it not been for the fact that Dr. Fulton, then secretary of the board of health of Maryland, had a suit case of documents containing facts on the subject, with which he was able to confront the lies which the delegation from California were trying to spread, simply for the benefit of a few merchants in San Francisco and to the prejudice and danger of the health of the entire country.

I believe that the theme of commercial versus hygienic interests has not been exhausted in Senator OWEN's speech, and that many other instances, equally important, could be given, some of which I am not free to mention, as they have come to me in a more or less confidential manner. Some of these concern the administration of the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Animal Industry in regard to meat inspection. With a Department of Agriculture, the main object of which is to improve the prosperity of farmers, including cattle raisers, it is not surprising that the inspection of meats and foods should often be aborted in the interests of the producers, for whom a Department of Agriculture largely exists, but against the much more important interests of the consumers who suffer from the ingestion of deleterious products. I do not believe that those who have not looked into this subject have the faintest conception of the extent to which the public is injured in this matter.

Dr. Wiley, who, in spite of accusations of going to extremes, is certainly a friend of the public interests, is very enthusiastic over the project of having a department of health, and one of his chief arguments is that such a department would afford the only good soil in which bureaus concerned with public health can really grow and flourish. Such bureaus, as long as they are subject to ministers of finance, agriculture, labor, commerce, etc., can never work untrammeled for the public good whenever a conflict of interests exists between the public good and that of the special interests of finance, agriculture, commerce, labor, etc. But the instant we have a department of health, with a secretary whose sworn duty it is to improve the health of the people, that instant we shall have the conditions for the untrammeled exercise of health protection by existing as well as newly created bureaus concerned in public health.

Another great advantage comes from the assembling together of the bureaus now existing and which sometimes work at cross purposes. There would be cooperation instead of duplication, mutual helpfulness and encouragement, and the growth which comes out of these conditions; in other words, economy and efficiency.

There would, I believe, be no need and no probability of duplication of work, as between the national and the State departments of health, any more than there is now a duplication as between the State departments and the municipal departments. The spheres of work of the two would be very different, not only as required by law but also because of the cooperation which would necessarily result. As proof of this we have a precedent in the Department of Agriculture, which has, I believe, never been accused of duplicating the work of the State agricultural experiment stations and colleges, but of helping them. In fact, there are other analogies, as between the United States Army organization and the State militia, which is a relation of mutual helpfulness. This aspect has been formerly considered by Dr. William C. Woodward, health officer of the city of Washington, who could give you more and better instances than occur to me offhand. Suffice it to say that the project for a department of health has been indorsed by the conference of State and Territorial boards of health and by a large number of individual municipal health officers. In fact, I do not know of any local health officers who have opposed a national department of health as duplicating their work. These people are, in general, the most enthusiastic of all for a national department of health, realizing that such a department would give an impetus to the interest in public health which would increase their own power and influence at one bound.

The Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, in its laboratory, has done great work in investigations, and I believe this is self-evidence of how much more could be accomplished if a larger sphere could be given to such investigations. Hookworm and pellagra, though important, are very trifling examples as compared with the results which we might hope for with a larger sphere. The greatest hygienic advances which the world has seen have come out of such department laboratories abroad, particularly the French work of Pasteur, which is the foundation of modern bacteriology, and the German work of Koch, which has done so much for tuberculosis. Proof of what can be done comes from the example of the Department of Agriculture, which has solved the many problems of animal and plant disease by putting experts to work to direct their energies to these specific objects. Some of the best work for public health has been an incidental result, as, for instance, the work of the Bureau of Entomology, under Dr. Howard, which has shown the influence of the typhoid fly, as he calls the common house fly, and as a consequence of which there is a country-wide antifly as well as antimosquito crusade.

After a number of years of study of the possibilities of investigation, I am satisfied that there is no subject with which I am at all familiar in which there are so many unexploited possibilities as in public health. For instance, in spite of all the work for improved ventilation and the crusade for outdoor living in connection with the fight against tuberculosis, we do not yet know what are the specific qualities of good as distinct from bad air. The old theory of carbon dioxide has been almost completely exploded, and we have now simply a great mass of conflicting working hypotheses; as, for instance, that it is the coolness, dryness, humidity, motion, electrification, ionization, ozone condition, freedom from organic impurities, freedom from bacteria, etc., which explains good air as distinct from bad. The instant this problem is solved, the question can be solved with it, and we shall know whether the proper means is to use an ozone machine, humidifier, an electric fan, or some other device.

I do not for a moment doubt that the establishment of a national department of health would lengthen human life very materially, also rapidly, for, besides the above-mentioned advantages, would come a general education of the public. This would take place through bulletins and the use of the public press and in other ways, such as visual exhibits, etc., in a manner similar to the way in which the Department of Agriculture has educated the farmer. A department can do this where a bureau can not, not only because the head would be more sympathetic with such work, but also because a department would have so much more prestige and would attract more attention. The great problem of education of the public consists, I believe, as newspaper men affirm, in getting the ear of the public. It is the large headlines which do the work of molding public opinion, and on the same principle it is a large department rather than a small bureau which will get the public ear. The Department of Agriculture when it was an independent bureau did not have a tithe of the influence which it now possesses.

It is a fact that life has been prolonged or death rates decreased fastest and best where there have been good departments of health. Statistics show that the country of most rapid advance in recent years is Germany, the only country which really has a true department of health. In this country the cities which have good departments of health show the result by a lower death rate, as witness New York, Chicago, and Washington, all of which places have remarkably good health officers. In New York the death rate responded at once to the cleaner streets of Col. Waring, to the improved milk crusade, to the tuberculosis notification law, etc., just as so many cities have responded at once to the introduction of water plants. By the way, Mr. Calvin W. Hendrick, who is putting in a several million dollar new sewerage system in Baltimore, is an enthusiastic advocate of a national department of health in order that it may supply models for municipal sanitation in respect to sewerage systems, etc., believing that in this manner such improvements as he is making in Baltimore could be communicated with great rapidity to other municipalities, which will probably not get these improvements otherwise within a generation. The average "city father" is conservative and will not run to Baltimore or any other city for information when he would take it as a matter of course from a department of health.

As I see it, the situation, in brief, is: First, that there is a great field for hygienic investigation unexploited; second, that the present scientific knowledge is a full generation in advance of its practical application; third, that in order both that knowledge shall increase and that present knowledge shall be applied we need a mechanism like a department of health which, like the Department of Agriculture, will perform the needed investigations and spread the existing knowledge.

I fear I am worrying you. There are many other things I would like to say. I take the liberty of sending with this a copy of my address before the Association of Life Insurance Presidents on the subject of the prolongation of human life, and a copy of a more recent address before the International Association of Accident Underwriters on the same subject. Various insurance associations and companies, including the International Association of Accident Underwriters, have passed resolutions favoring a department of health.

If you have not seen my report to President Roosevelt on National Vitality, and would care to look it over, I should be much pleased to have the opportunity of sending you a copy. Life insurance men are showing a great interest in the subject at present, as you doubtless know. Mr. Messenger, actuary of the Travelers' Life Insurance Co., is one of the Hartford men most interested. President Holcombe, President Dunham, Vice President Lunger, and others are also interested.

If I can be of any service to you at any time, I should be very much pleased.

Yours, very sincerely, ——— ———.

Great and organized opposition to the establishment of a department of health has been carried on by a so-called League for Medical Freedom. This league has many good people in it who are misled—Christian Scientists who deny disease, and some good citizens who have been falsely led to believe their liberty will be invaded—some people who do not think, and some people who have an evil purpose, a sinister commercial purpose, who are engaged in promoting patent medicine. There is a description in Collier's on May 6 and June 3 of this League of Medical Freedom, which is of sufficient interest to justify its being read to the Senate, but without objection I will, Mr. President, insert it in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. OWEN. I will then proceed to read into the RECORD this extract. It is as follows:

[From Collier's, May 6, 1911.]

"A BAD BUNCH.

"An octopus which we don't like is the League for Medical Freedom. It is doing a tremendous amount of damage by its opposition to needed medical legislation along all lines relating to the public health throughout the United States. In the excellent California Legislature, for instance, this year, efforts for better sanitary laws were largely blocked by this organization, thoroughly equipped with ready money, and extensive in its hold upon the imaginative minds of many citizens. These gophers have worked underground, since the league came into existence, to counteract the pure food and drugs act of 1906. The membership is composed for the most part of those who were hit hard by the act. Expensive lobbies are maintained at Washington, and in many State capitals, for the purpose of defeating health legislation. In 1909–1911 important bills relating to the health of the Nation were held up in Congress at the instigation of the league. It is alleged that $25,000 per week was spent by the league lobby. There is probably no accurate way of computing the amounts that have been spent in Washington or at the various State capitals. One method of attack consists in sending showers of telegrams of protest to the Senators and Representatives from all parts of the Union, and especially from the home districts of the lawmakers. These protests are invariably misrepresentations of the real purpose of the proposed legislation. Organizations have been formed in every State of the Union, and attorneys employed to represent the league before conventions, legislative committees, and municipal meetings of all kinds. Another plan of procedure is to send circular letters to delegates of conventions requesting them, in the name of "liberty and fraternity," to vote against any medical resolution that might be introduced. It has always been difficult to get appropriations for health purposes, and if this league continues to fight the health authorities we must expect an increase in the death rate in all States in the next year or two. In Chicago, where the league is strongest, in 1908 the death rate was 14.08 per 1,000 per annum; in 1910 it was 15.21 per 1,000."

I remind the Senate that the chairman of the Committee on Public Health had a thousand telegrams put in his hands on one day, coming through the agents of this so-called League of Medical Freedom, opposing the department of health, although the department of health proposed nothing in the world except the coordination of Federal activities that we already have and putting them together under one intelligent management.

Many citizens telegraphed who thought they would be subjected to compulsory vaccination, who thought their domiciles would be invaded. Many engaged in the art of healing and preventing disease protested under the false assurance that a department of race conservation and of human health meant that they would be denied a license to practice osteopathy, and so forth.

Many protested under the erroneous advice that a department of human conservation of the United States would invade State rights and interfere with local authority. These manufactured telegrams and protests had no genuine foundation of fear. They were manufactured wholesale by sinister commercial forces, that had an unlimited treasury of money, able to organize at once these patent-medicine leagues of medical freedom in many States and flood the press with half-page advertisements in box-car letters.

Collier's answers some of the victimized members of this league who protested against the first editorial, as follows:

[From Collier's, June 3, 1911.]

"LIBERTY.

"Protests from readers have greeted our criticism of the League for Medical Freedom. Also a protest is telegraphed from the California branch of the league. In the minds of most of those who protest the principal objections are to the following positions taken by us: 1. That the league contains the kind of men who opposed the pure-food act. 2. That the activities of the league are against public welfare and frequently surreptitious. Our answer follows:

"1. B. O. Flower, one of the nine founders of the league, and now in his second term as president of it, was president of 'The R. C. Flower Medicine Co.' from 1885 to 1899. R. C. Flower is the notorious quack and general humbug whose latest arrest was as late as 1908. B. O. Flower wrote the league's pamphlets on Bubonic Plague and The Compulsory Medical Inspection of School Children. His views on patent medicine are often expressed. For instance:

"I believe that a great majority of the proprietary medicines are infinitely less dangerous to the public than the majority of regular doctors' prescriptions.

"2. C. W. Miller, second vice president of the league, was also one of the founders. In his newspaper, which publishes patent medicine advertising, he has constantly fought the medical profession. Last year one of his addresses against what he calls a 'doctors' trust' was delivered to the Dairy Association in Baltimore. We may say in passing that Collier's does not believe in freedom to sell tuberculous milk any more than it does in freedom to sell tuberculous meat.

"3. Mrs. Diana Belais, a director and also a founder, has appeared before in this paper as president of an antiexperiment society, a well-meaning, ignorant, reckless, and muddle-headed agitator. We are officially informed by the chairman of the 'committee on publicity and education' of the league that Mrs. Belais was made a director 'because of her courageous efforts to secure a higher law in New York State than the doctors' cruel theories and professional arrogance.' Here's to antiexperiment, meningitis, diphtheria, and freedom!

"4. Dr. C. S. Carr, who is on the advisory boards, edits a pseudo-medical sheet. Collier's long ago printed a letter signed 'The Peruna Drug Co., per Carr.' As editor of Medical Talk for the Home he carried advertisements of many of the medicines exposed in Collier's in our series on 'The great American fraud.' He is now editor of the Columbus Medical Journal, which he at once turned from an ethical sheet into a sheer fraud. Look at the issue of May, 1909. On the front cover is a picture of Carr himself writing, 'All drugs are poison. All druggists are poisoners.' On the reverse side is an advertisement beginning, 'Prescribe Antikamnia and Codein tablets in la grippe, headaches, etc.' Hurrah for freedom and Peruna!

"5. George P. Englehard, who is on the advisory board, has for a long time in his journal defended the patent-medicine interests.

"6. Charles Huhn, also a member of the board, is a prominent officer in a cooperative patent-medicine concern.

"7. Another founder was a member of the advertising agency which is now spending for the league the money which it puts into its advertising campaigns.

"The league says it did not oppose any 'sanitary or quarantine laws.' This statement requires some hardihood, as the hearings of the Senate Committee on Health, and more especially of the House Committee on Foreign and Interstate Commerce, show. It would interest us to know whether the league can point out a single health bill introduced in Congress which it has not opposed. When the leaders wish to oppose a sanitary or quarantine law they do it on the ground that such a law would indirectly 'lead to compulsory and discriminatory legislation.'

"The league was nominally born recently, but those who make it up had already as individuals, and even as organizations (such as the Colorado League for Medical Liberty), opposed State and national legislation. A pamphlet published by the Colorado branch singles out Collier's for attack, and was written by a notorious quack doctor. In California, which was the special theme of our former editorial, if the league should prevail, the next threat of bubonic plague would be carried out, instead of being suppressed like the last; smallpox might again become a serious epidemic; school children would bear their ills as best they might. A bill was introduced ordering that the board of health be composed of 2 'allopaths' (a school which does not exist, but is a hostile term for regular physicians), 2 homeopaths, 2 'eclectics,' 2 osteopaths. It did not pass."

"Some leading homeopathists and osteopathists, be it said, are in favor of a national health bureau and strongly against the agitations of the league. Dr. Francis B. Kellogg, president of the California State Homeopathic Society, in an address recently said:

"* * * In my opinion there is an effort being made to exploit the homeopathic profession by influences and interests which are indirectly but radically opposed to the welfare not only of practitioners of medicine in general, but to that of humanity itself. I refer to the effort to enlist homeopathic support for the so-called National League for Medical Freedom.

"Plato complained that in his day doctors made too sharp a distinction between the body and the mind. In our day the best class of physicians frequently recommend faith cure and Christian Science, and the Emmanuel movement is an indication that it is possible for science and religion to work together in healing. Few mere observers rate the benefits that Christian Science has brought to the community more highly than we do. A belief which so frequently brings about an actual improvement in character, disposition, bodily health, and mental atmosphere deserves the most serious recognition, even by those who regret its hostility to the progressive science of medicine. It is possible at times for clever designers to use members of any faith for disastrous purposes. When R. C. Flower was at the height of his career, in 1907, as manufacturer of diamonds, vender of fake mining stock, wearer of most ingenious disguises, traveler under assumed names, and general artist in gold bricks, he conceived the idea of playing for profit upon the earnest beliefs of the followers of Mrs. Eddy. One of his accomplices, a woman, who also used an assumed name, worked the game with him, and when Dr. Flower, alias Mr. Cortland, took up the cudgels in defense of Christian Science, without being requested to do so, he said:

"Not that I am one of its disciples, but I like to see everyone free to practice medicine as he wishes.

"Here we have the very words themselves from old Doc Flower. Up with freedom!

"Everybody who believes in 'freedom' in medicine is within his natural and political rights in supporting this league. Collier's, not believing in this species of 'freedom,' is also within its rights in treating the league as a menace, the make-up, bias, and purpose of which ought to be fully understood."

I have a few more editorials from the American Medical Association Journal, which I shall read into the RECORD for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desired that the Senator from Oklahoma should read the criticisms which he has, because I think it is but fair that the Senate should hear them rather than have them placed in the RECORD without reading, where we probably never would acquaint ourselves with them.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is probably true.

Mr. GALLINGER. If this so-called League of Medical Freedom is as Collier's pictures it to be, of course it is not worthy of the confidence of anybody. I do not want the Senator or the Senate to think that my objection to having the matter placed in the RECORD without reading was because I have indorsed that organization, for I know nothing about it, except what the Senator from Oklahoma has now acquainted us with. I would not ask the Senator to read the other articles he has, but would be glad to have him place those in the RECORD if he so desires.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire, but I prefer to read them.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I want to say that I am not myself a member of the League for Medical Freedom and have no connection with it in any way whatever; but, so far as the members of that league in the State of California are concerned, many of them I know personally, and they are of the very best citizenship of our State; and so far as this article refers to that league in California it is utterly unjust.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I opened my remarks by saying that there were many most excellent people who were members of the League for Medical Freedom, so called, many of who are Christian Scientists, who are osteopaths, who are homeopaths, people for whom I have the highest respect, but this description of this league and its officers by Collier's deals directly with the individuals at the head of this organization and points out who those directors are.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma further yield?

Mr. OWEN I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WORKS. But the comments of the Senator from Oklahoma, as well as the comments of the article itself, are not confined to individuals, but are general in their scope.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the membership of this so-called league, in my judgment, have been deliberately misled by sinister interests, and the membership which has been thus added to these alleged rolls of membership has no means of expressing itself. The expression comes through its officers. Those officers are described by Collier's, and I think it would be well for the membership of that organization to look to the directors and see who they are and understand what is at the bottom of this movement. That is the purpose of my reading into the RECORD the history of this so-called organization. I shall now read some editorials from the Journal of the American Medical Association:

SOME EDITORIALS FROM THE JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION—THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION CALLED A TRUST.

"'Trust' is a good word to juggle with nowadays, for to most people it conjures up visions of extortion, robbery, and general oppression. When, therefore, any organization is to be attacked and there are no tangible charges to be preferred against it, it is dubbed a 'trust,' and by that very token is damned in the premises."

I want to say right here that in my State half-page advertisements in huge letters were spread all over that State by this so-called League for Medical Freedom, practically denouncing the medical profession of this country as being a "medical trust," desirous of depriving citizens of their rights to employ any physician they pleased, to use any medicine they pleased, and giving it to be understood that the purpose of a department of health was the invasion of the private home of the citizen and the invasion of the constitutional rights of the State. The members of the so-called League for Medical Freedom have been grossly imposed upon and have been grossly misrepresented as to what they truly stand for. I know what many of their members stand for perfectly well, and I am in accord with them cordially and sincerely. I know what the Christian Scientists stand for, and I sympathize with them; I understand what the osteopaths stand for, too, and I think they serve a good and useful purpose. They have been misled by the agents of the patent medicine association in this country, that are actively engaged in promoting the drug habit in our citizens, and this declaration on the part of the so-called League for Medical Freedom against the American Medical Association is not only unjust and unfair, but it is disgraceful and utterly untrustworthy.

The article continues:

"In this manner the American Medical Association becomes the 'doctors' trust,' according to the 'National League for Medical Freedom' and other organizations with equally high-sounding and misleading names, fathered by the 'patent-medicine' interests. Not that the term originated with this widely advertised 'league,' although some 15 or 16 years ago the president of this 'league' attacked the medical profession in a magazine article on 'Medical monopoly.' The representatives and mouthpieces of the proprietary interests have long employed it; notably Strong, through his two journals, the National Druggist and the Medical Brief, and Engelhard, through his journals, the Western Druggist and the Medical Standard. As the proprietors of these publications are found among the personnel of the 'league' it is natural that this latest 'patent-medicine' organization should have appropriated a figure of speech possessing such magnificent potentialities.

"To the proprietary men the American Medical Association is a trust because, they allege, it has attempted to dictate to physicians what medicinal preparations they shall and shall not use; or, to put it more baldly, because the fraudulency and worthlessness of various proprietary products have been made clear in the Journal. Others have accused the association of being a trust because it has attempted to raise the standard of medical education and thereby to 'control the output of medical students.' But the reason advanced by the 'league' is a brand-new one, invented, no doubt, in the hope that it will reach the public's heart through its most direct route—the purse. The American Medical Association is a trust, we are told, because it has established a schedule of prices by which all its members are bound. The president of the 'league' is reported as saying:

"The [American Medical] Association now fixes the prices charged by physicians in America.

"More specifically the 'league's' vice president puts it:

"The American Medical Association has secured the adoption of its scale of prices throughout the country. * * *

"To such a charge there is but one answer, and that an all-sufficient one, viz, that it is a falsehood, and a stupid one at that. Every physician and every layman who has ever investigated the matter knows that as a matter of fact the American Medical Association has never even suggested that the 'price' of medical service be 'fixed,' but on the contrary has positively discouraged such a proposition. The recommendation in the Principles of Medical Ethics that individual physicians in any locality should adopt some general rules 'relative to the minimum pecuniary acknowledgment from their patients,' has been taken and an attempt made to read into it a meaning never intended and certainly never accepted. What the attitude of the association is on this point is well set forth in the standard Constitution and By-laws for County Societies, prepared by a committee of the American Medical Association and recommended and very generally adopted by various county societies:

"SEC. 3. Agreements and schedules of fees shall not be made by this society. * * *

"And yet the falsehood is blazoned forth, with a prodigal disregard for the expense entailed, by means of display advertisements and 'interviews,' that the American Medical Association 'fixes the price' of medical service. Of course, the 'league' had to have some shibboleth, and the accusation that the American Medical Association is a 'trust' is an untruth that may be counted on to arouse the interest of the unthinking and to give a more or less plausible excuse for the 'league's' existence. How absurdly mendacious the accusation is the medical profession already knows and the public will not be long in learning.

"Again we say: The publicity which the 'patent-medicine' interests are giving to the American Medical Association through this 'league' is welcomed. The more the people know about the association and the work it is doing, the keener the investigation made of its methods and aims, the better it will be not only for the American Medical Association and the medical profession of the country, but also, more important than all, for the public itself." (Editorial, Journal American Medical Association.)

Mr. President, the American Medical Association has published at great length scientific and careful analyses of most of the nostrums and patent-medicine frauds of this country. They have given wide publicity to it, and in that way they have excited the violent animosity and hostility of the patent-medicine people, so that the declaration is made by them that the medical profession comprises a trust. In point of fact, if the American Medical Society form a trust and if they are concerned in establishing a department of health with a view to preventing sickness, which would be the purpose of a department of health, they would be engaged in tearing down their own business; they would be engaged in depriving themselves of their patients from whom they make their living. It would be the only trust in existence which is concerned in diminishing its own revenues and destroying its own financial foundation. Such a trust as that is a very novel trust and one that deserves encouragement.

Now, Mr. President, without further objection, I will submit for printing in the RECORD the concluding editorials.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A NEW COMBINATION AGAINST THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION.

"Within the past few days the newspapers of the chief cities of the country have carried large advertisements headed, 'Do you want the "Doctors' Trust" to be able to force its opinions on you?' These advertisements paint in vivid colors—'yellow' predominating—the disaster and general destruction that will follow the formation of a Federal department of health. They emanate from, or, to be more correct, are signed by, an organization calling itself the 'National League for Medical Freedom.' In addition to the regular display advertisements the press agent is supplying matter for the reading pages, and there is every evidence that the propaganda is not lacking financial support. Of course, the American Medical Association is the bête noire the 'league' seeks to kill; it is the 'Medical Trust' referred to. Members of the association will be surprised to learn that if a national department of health is created it will result in 'denying to the people the right to determine for themselves the kind of medical treatment they shall employ.' For this reason, and so far as the advertisements state, for this reason only, the National League for Medical Freedom has been brought into being. As a slogan, under which the real reasons for organizing may be carefully concealed, it may serve its purpose. Most people prefer to have their thinking done for them, and this alone will prevent the absurdity of such a proposition as that on which the 'league' is ostensibly founded becoming apparent. Yet every person with the most elemental knowledge of our Government knows that the regulation of the practice of medicine and the licensing of physicians is a function of the State, and that any law attempting to confer such power on a department of the Federal Government would be unconstitutional. The proposed department of health would have just as much authority to determine what 'kind of medical treatment' the people should employ as the Department of Agriculture has to dictate to the farmer regarding the implement company he shall buy his plows of. Yet we are asked to believe, apparently, that a national department of health would mean that the free-born American citizen who wanted to have a purulent appendix cured by the 'spinal adjustment' route would have to patronize a surgeon, even though he were a 'conscientious objector' to surgery. It would mean, it seems, that the individual suffering from malaria who wished to be freed from this 'moral error' by 'absent treatment' would be ignominiously dragged to the internist and dosed with quinine. It would mean that the optimist who would cure his rheumatism by wearing a 'guaranteed magnetic ring' would have to endure the administration of the salicylates. It would mean—but why pursue these harrowing predictions further?

"Seriously, though, there must be something wrong with the mental make-up of the individuals composing this 'league' who expect—even by such potent means as the lavish distribution of printer's ink—to persuade a reasonably sane people that any law might, could, or would be enacted that would curtail the rights of the public as they have suggested. Of course, the fact is that the moving spirits behind the organization of the 'league' have neither an overwhelming solicitude for the public welfare nor any strenuous objection to the formation of a national department of health. The 'league's' actual, and fairly evident, raison d'être is opposition to and antagonism against the American Medical Association. To disclose the source of this opposition it is only necessary to call attention to some of the members of the 'advisory board'—high-sounding title—as reported in the newspapers, to make reasonably clear to the members of the American Medical Association the 'power behind' the 'league.' The publisher of the Medical Standard and Western Druggist, for instance, has long been known as a defender of, and mouthpiece for the 'patent medicine' and proprietary interests. His presence on the 'advisory board' is fitting, and the only surprising thing about it is that he should have been guilty of such a tactical blunder as getting into the fierce light of publicity.

"That the president of the American Druggists' Syndicate should be on the 'board' was to be looked for, and being looked for, is found. And there are others! Among the lesser satellites in this distinguished galaxy are those who very naturally might be expected to enter enthusiastically into such a campaign—the president of an antivivisection society, some 'mental healers' and one or two journalists of varying degrees of obscurity. Of the latter, one has for years been strongly opposed to medical organization and more recently has taken up that mental vagary known as 'new thought.' Taking into consideration both the objects of the 'league' and the personnel of its 'board' one feels that the New York Journal expressed only a half truth when it said:

"The druggists and the proprietary medicine interests throughout the country are said to be chiefly concerned in defeating the Owen bill.

"It would have been nearer the facts if for 'defeating the Owen bill' were substituted the clause 'attempting to disrupt the American Medical Association.' A dozen years ago the public might not have been able to see the animus prompting this attack; to-day it is wiser.

"As to the publicity which this sensational and costly campaign will give to the American Medical Association, the medical profession may welcome it. One thing that has long been needed is that of directing the attention of the laity to the aims and accomplishments of the American Medical Association. It welcomes investigation; the more the public learns about the work the association is doing the better for the association. It has nothing to be ashamed of, but it has a great deal to be proud of; its work in the interests of both public welfare and scientific medicine is and always has been open and aboveboard. The association needs no defense; it is not only well able to stand on its record, but is proud of that record." (Editorial, Journal American Medical Association.)

"NATIONAL CONSERVATION CONGRESS AND A DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

"The National Conservation Congress, recently in session in St. Paul adopted a platform setting forth the views of the delegates as to the duty of the Federal and State Governments in conserving the natural and vital resources of the Nation. One of the planks, unanimously adopted by the committee on resolutions and later by the convention itself, indorsed in no uncertain terms the establishment of a department of health. This plank read: 'We also recommend that in order to make better provision for preserving the health of the Nation a department of public health be established by the National Government.' This declaration was adopted in spite of a large amount of carefully stimulated (and simulated) opposition. The plank was introduced before the committee on resolutions by a delegate from Pennsylvania. As soon as it was known that there was likelihood of its adoption telegrams from all over the country began to pour in on the members of the committee on resolutions, requesting, urging, and demanding that no action be taken on this subject. On Thursday morning, when the delegates assembled in the auditorium, there was found on each seat a marked copy of the Pioneer Press containing a full-length, two-column 'appeal' (otherwise known as advertising matter) from the National League for Medical Freedom, reiterating previously made statements regarding 'political doctors,' 'medical trust,' 'interference with liberty,' and other stock bugbears. But, as a reporter for the Pioneer Press said, 'the delegates smiled.' The men composing the convention, who had been sent to St. Paul to represent the interests of the people and not the people of the interests, who had been able to detect the cloven hoof of monopoly under the specious plea for 'State rights' which had been made in the opening days of the convention, were not slow to understand who and what were the influences back of the objections to governmental action for the saving of life. 'The delegates smiled' when they received the telegrams, when they adopted the resolution of the committee and when the unanimous vote of the convention approved the platform. It was the sound judgment and common sense of the average American citizen which led the delegates to realize that health and life are important and that the only men who oppose any means by which life can be saved are those who have a selfish and mercenary interest in perpetuating present conditions." (Editorial, Journal American Medical Association.)

"WHO PAYS THE BILLS?

"Newspaper men are not easily misled as to motives, neither are they slow to recognize the real forces behind an effort to influence public sentiment. An editorial in a recent number of the Baltimore Evening Sun shows how the better class of newspaper editors regard the strenuous and well-nigh hysterical efforts now being made to simulate a popular uprising against the awful iniquity of national health legislation.

"As the Sun well says, the mere statement of the arguments of the National League for Medical Freedom is all the answer that is necessary. But the attack on the Owen bill is only a pretext. The American Medical Association is the real target. The forces behind this movement are endeavoring to take advantage of the popular feeling against trusts and monopolies by branding the American Medical Association as a 'doctors' trust,' a designation, by the way, which originated with certain so-called medical journals which derived their support from nostrum vendors.

"Evidently, the manufacturers of 'baby killers,' sophisticated and adulterated foodstuffs, cheap and bad whiskies under the guise of 'family remedies,' and fakirs and swindlers doing business under the guise of physicians, hope that the American public and press will accept this designation without asking for proof or evidence, and that by such methods the American Medical Association and its work can be discredited in the public estimation. 'The delegates smiled' when the members of the committee on resolutions, at the Conservation Congress at St. Paul, were overwhelmed with a flood of telegrams carefully arranged for beforehand, protesting against the indorsement of a national department of health. Truly, newspaper editors and managers must smile with equal persistency when 'copy' is received for half-page advertisements at a daily cost of $25,000, denouncing the national organization of the medical profession as a 'doctors' trust.' Newspaper men know the cost of a general advertising campaign. They also know that only those who are financially and mercenarily interested in blocking the work which the American Medical Association is doing, and who fear to have any further light thrown on their nefarious doings, would furnish the money for such an extensive and expensive advertising campaign. The National League for Medical Freedom asks no dues of its 'members,' yet it has used large quantities of the most expensive newspaper advertising space. Who pays the bills, and whence comes all the money?

"Certainly it does not come from the few homeopaths who have joined the league, nor from the few eclectics, nor from the small number of osteopaths; and surely the Christian Scientists are not shouldering this enormous burden. The obvious conclusion is that the money comes from those exploiters of human weakness and credulity whose fraudulent practices have been exposed by the American Medical Association, and whose pocketbooks have been injured in consequence." (Editorial, Journal American Medical Association.)

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, out of order, I ask leave to offer a proposed amendment to the so-called free-list bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator ask to have it printed and lie upon the table?

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that it be printed and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I had hoped to submit a few views upon the question pending before the Senate—the amendment to the paper section of the reciprocity bill—but I do not care to do so this afternoon, inasmuch as the Senators to whom I wish to particularly address my remarks seem to have very little interest in the matter.

I favor the amendment and believe that I have more confidence in its adoption than apparently the author of the amendment has. If I can do anything to secure favorable action by the Senate, I desire to have the opportunity to do so; but, as I have said, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate when there are those absent to whom I wish particularly to address myself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand to what amendment the Senator referred when he said he was in favor of it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The so-called Root amendment to the Canadian reciprocity bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator was talking about the free-list bill in connection with the amendment just submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and the statement was interesting to me in that way.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not know what amendment the Senator refers to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said I thought the Senator referred to the free-list bill in connection with the amendment just offered by the Senator from Minnesota to that bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not understand that the amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from Minnesota is now pending. I understand the pending question to be on the amendment of which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is the author and which has been reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SIMMONS. I entirely misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In accordance with the suggestion I have made, Mr. President, I shall withhold what I have to say; but if at any time I do take up the matter, I will attempt to do so on Monday next before the amendment is voted on.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his motion?

Mr. SMOOT. I withhold the motion.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to present an amendment which at the proper time I intend to offer to the pending reciprocity bill as a separate and independent section. I ask that the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 26, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 24, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, above all, through all, and in all, to quicken, to inspire, to guide, amid the conflicting elements, the profound problems, the strenuous duties which appeal to every serious, strong-minded, noble-hearted man, we thank Thee for the special order of the day in memory of such a man who met life and its problems with the courage and fortitude of a great soul and distinguished himself wherever he was called to serve—on the field of battle, at the bar of justice, in the legislative halls of State and Nation. Quick to perceive, clear of judgment, wise in counsel, strong in action, eloquent of speech, a leader of men; patient, gentle, easy of approach, a friend of the friendless, a follower of the King of men; respected, honored, loved by all who knew him; called from a life of usefulness with a character full, rounded out, a passport to the realms of eternal life; we thank Thee for what he was and for what he did, and we pray that his example may inspire us and those who shall come after us to earnest endeavor and purity of purpose. Be graciously near to all who mourn him, especially the bereaved wife and children, to uphold, sustain, and comfort them in the blessed promises of the gospel. And glory and honor and praise be Thine forever, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, June 21, 1911, was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a moment to displace the special order for to-day and wish to state the purpose of so doing. The Committee on Appropriations have directed me to report a bill supplying deficiencies in certain appropriations for the service of the House and one additional emergency item for the District of Columbia, and if there be no objection I would wish to present the bill and ask to have it considered at once.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asks unanimous consent to postpone temporarily the special order and that the matter which he mentions may be considered.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman to give us some idea of the emergency for this deficiency appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only items in this bill are two appropriations, one to supply deficiencies in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives. The fund is exhausted, witnesses are being brought here by various committees and there is no money to pay their fees, and in addition to that there are one or two other items connected with the House and one item with regard to the District of Columbia.

Mr. MACON. Can the gentleman give some idea as to how much we had in the contingent fund when Congress convened on the 4th of April?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MACON. Can the gentleman give some idea about how much of the contingent fund has been expended since the 4th of April?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They require now about $31,000 additional.

Mr. MACON. How much has been expended up to this time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Everything has been expended.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman does not know the amount of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I can state the amount. The contingent fund amounted to $75,000. That amount was appropriated for the contingent fund for the current fiscal year.

Mr. MACON. And that has been expended up to this time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is practically exhausted. It is considerably less than has been appropriated in recent years.

Mr. MACON. In the language of the street, does not the gentleman think "that is going some" when it comes to expending the money of the people?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This deficiency is created from the fact that the House has imposed certain duties upon certain committees and from the fact that the House, being in extraordinary session, certain matters were necessarily done which would require additional money. In the last fiscal year, 1910, if the gentleman will permit me, the appropriation was $75,000, with a deficiency of $35,000. In 1909 it was $75,000, with a deficiency of $40,000; in 1908 it was $50,000, and a deficiency appropriation of $120,000, so that this deficiency is not at all extraordinary or unusual. It is impossible accurately to estimate what amount will be required for this fund. For instance, the House in the last Congress authorized an investigation of the friar lands, and some $8,000 were expended for the fees of witnesses brought here from the Philippine Islands, something entirely unanticipated when the appropriation was made, and yet it depletes the fund which is available for the necessities of the House.

Mr. MACON. Can not the gentleman's committee devise some plan by which these appropriations for investigation expenditures can be held down to the amount appropriated?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; the Committee on Accounts——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit, he will understand the gentleman's committee has not made any appropriation for any fiscal year thus far; but the House finds itself with certain outstanding accounts and the money from which those accounts must be paid is exhausted.

Mr. MACON. How much is proposed to be appropriated now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty-one thousand dollars.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if this deficit is not in the appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1911?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is. The year will end next Friday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from New York that it is quite evident there is not a quorum of the House in the Chamber, or possibly in town. While it is not likely that the point of no quorum would be made, yet no one can predict what might be done in the consideration of an appropriation bill; but if the point of no quorum should be made in the consideration of this appropriation bill, the gentleman can see it would be very embarrassing in the order of the day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if anyone suggests that a point of no quorum will be made I should ask to withdraw the bill. The House Members desire to adjourn to-day for three days. If we can dispose of this matter to-day, it will not be necessary for the House to meet on Monday. Otherwise, in order that the committees which are doing important work may not be seriously embarrassed, the money must be appropriated to enable them to do their work. So if there be objection on the part of anybody,

I shall ask to withdraw the bill, so as not to interfere with the special order of to-day.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman it would be in better taste to proceed with the special order, which is in memory of one of the very distinguished men of the country, rather than to take this up to-day, and then meet on Monday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, I conferred with the gentlemen who are in charge of the exercises for the day——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Permit me a moment. Ordinarily some Members are delayed a little in arriving in the House who desire to participate in the exercises, and the gentleman who has charge of the exercises believed that if this bill was considered it would not take very much time and it would afford an opportunity for those who desired to be here to reach the House in time to participate in the exercises in honor of the distinguished gentleman who represented Virginia so long in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. That reason does not appeal to me. I think this is a matter that would be likely to take a little time in debate, in all probability, and I think we can afford to meet on Monday. I am just as anxious to get out of town as the gentleman from New York is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not inconvenience me any, Mr. Speaker, because I must stay in the city, I regret to say; but there are a number of gentlemen who desire to take advantage of the situation in order to be away for a few days. However, if any gentleman desires to object, it will necessitate the matter going over.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his request.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I prefer to have the objection made. That will relieve me from responsibility in the matter.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires, I will accommodate him. I object.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw that objection. It is an embarrassing thing to have accounts presented against the contingent fund of the House and no money in that fund to pay them, and that is the condition to-day. Nearly all the claims for which this $30,000 deficiency is proposed to be appropriated are claims now in the hands of the disbursing clerk or before the Committee on Accounts.

We would be very glad indeed if we were placed in a position where these accounts that have already been allowed, for expenditures already made, can be paid. Witnesses have been called before these special committees and fees have been allowed, so far as the committee is concerned, and passed upon by the proper authorities and directed by the House to be paid, and still there is no money in this fund to pay them, and this is working a great inconvenience in some instances to the witnesses who have appeared before the committees.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I accept the responsibility of objecting, but I decline to accept the responsibility of standing in the light of an appropriation. Every one in the House has known ever since the House has met that the contingent fund of the House was practically exhausted and would be exhausted before the end of the fiscal year. It is not my fault if the Committee on Appropriations or some other committee has not proposed before this to reimburse this fund, or to provide for the contingencies which have arisen and which we knew would arise, and which arose before.

Mr. LLOYD. We could not tell until within the last few days anything like what would be necessary to meet this deficiency, and we feel sure that we have come within a very few dollars of the amount needed to meet these expenditures between now and the last day of June.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I recognized several months ago that it would take $25,000 to cover two of the items.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that he is going to insist that a quorum shall be present in the House when this bill is considered?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have not made any such statement as that.

Mr. GARNER. What is the ground of the gentleman's objection, then? The proposition seems to be agreeable to every one except himself.
